I. FILING OF PETITION

A. Initial Order

Court issues either: 1) Initial order upon filing petition and granting temporary custody to the Department of Health and Human Resources or to responsible relative; or 2) Initial order upon filing petition and not granting temporary custody.[2] W. Va. Code § 49-4-602. Temporary custody may only be ordered upon a finding of imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a). The order must also state that continuation in the home is contrary to the welfare or best interests of the child and indicate whether reasonable efforts to preserve the family were made or whether reasonable efforts were not required because of the emergency situation. Id.

1. Initial order granting temporary custody
   W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a); Rule 16.

[2] See W. Va. Code § 49-4-303 for ratification procedure when the Department takes emergency protective custody of child without prior court order. See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-301 (emergency custody by law-enforcement officers); and § 49-4-302 (emergency custody orders by family court).

a. Sets a preliminary hearing of petition within ten days of original filing; giving at least five days notice of such hearing. Rules 20 and 22.

b. If a parent is a co-petitioner, appoints that parent counsel separate from the prosecuting attorney. Rule 17(a); W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

c. Appoints counsel for the child, any parent, legally established custodian or other persons standing in loco parentis to the child, and for any other qualified respondent who appears and requests appointed counsel. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

d. Provides for immediate transfer of child to the Department or responsible person.

e. Court may appoint a CASA representative for child in areas where CASA program is in good standing. Rules 20 and 52(a).

f. Court may also direct any party or the Department to initiate or become involved in services to facilitate reunification of the family.

2. Initial order which does not grant temporary custody
W. Va. Code § 49-4-602.

a. Court may set a preliminary hearing of petition upon at least five days notice to parents, if facts alleged in petition demonstrate imminent danger to child. If no preliminary hearing is set, the court should set the adjudicatory hearing, giving at least ten days notice. Rule 20. In such cases, the adjudicatory hearing must begin within 30 days of the filing of the petition, provided no preadjudicatory improvement period is granted. Rule 25.

b. If a parent is a co-petitioner, appoints that parent counsel separate from the prosecuting attorney. Rule 17(a); W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

c. Appoints counsel for child, any parent, any legally established custodian or other persons standing in loco parentis to the child, and any qualified respondent who appears and requests appointed counsel. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

d. Court may appoint a CASA representative for child in area where CASA program is in good standing. Rules 20 and 52(a).

B. Notice

Notice of the first hearing should be provided with the initial order. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a)-(b); Rule 20.

1. Shall be sent to all parties and other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard at the hearing. Rule 20.

2. Notice specifies time and place of hearing and statement that proceedings can result in termination of parental rights. Rule 20.

3. Notice specifies the respondent's right to counsel and right to appointed counsel upon proof of financial eligibility. Rule 17(c)(5); W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

C. Disclosures

Unless otherwise ordered, within three days of filing of petition, prosecutors shall provide all parties and other persons entitled to notice and right to be heard with discovery relevant to preparation of case. Rule 10(b). Not less than five days before any hearing, parents shall disclose to all parties evidence and witnesses they intend to offer at hearing. Rule 10(c).

D. Answer

The parents shall file and serve a verified answer to the petition within ten days of being served with the petition or the applicable time prescribed when served by publication or other substituted service. Rule 17(b).

E. Multidisciplinary Treatment Team

Within 30 days of the original filing of the petition, the court shall cause to be convened a meeting of a multidisciplinary treatment team (MDT) assigned to the child's case. W. Va. Code § 49-4-405; Rule 51(a). The MDT shall submit written reports to the court, and shall meet with the court at least every three months until permanency is achieved and the case is dismissed. The MDT shall be available to meet with the court for status conferences and hearings. Rule 51(c); W. Va. Code § 49-4-405(d).

II. PRELIMINARY HEARING

A. Relevant Inquiry

The court will review the petition and take evidence regarding status of the child, whether the Department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family, and whether imminent danger necessitates removal of the child from custody of the parents or continuation of previously ordered emergency custody. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-105; 49-4-602; Rules 16 and 22.

1. Order determines temporary custody of child giving reasons for need to remove from home if removal is ordered. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b).

2. Order sets date for adjudicatory hearing within 30 days if the child is placed in temporary custody of the Department or responsible relative, unless a pre-adjudicatory improvement period is awarded to the parents. Rule 25.

3. When a child is placed in the temporary custody of the Department or a responsible person, the adjudicatory hearing shall be given priority on the court docket. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(j).

4. When a child has been placed in the custody of the Department or the custodial and decision-making responsibility has been altered, the order must establish a child support obligation. The order shall also require the parent(s) to complete financial forms to determine Title IV-D and IV-E eligibility and the amount of any child support obligation. Rules 16a and 17(c)(5).

5. Order requires any respondent to complete forms to determine eligibility for court-appointed counsel. Rule 17(c)(5).

III. PRE-ADJUDICATORY IMPROVEMENT PERIOD

At any time prior to the adjudicatory hearing, a respondent may move for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period in accordance with West Virginia Code § 49-4-610 and Rule 23.

A. Family Case Plan

If the motion is granted, the court shall order the Department to submit a family case plan within 30 days, which family case plan shall contain the information required by Rule 28. See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-408. The family case plan shall be formulated with the assistance of all parties, counsel, and the multi-disciplinary treatment team. The family case plan and improvement period order should closely track one another and taken together should constitute a program designed to remedy the circumstances which led to the filing of the petition. Rule 23(a).

B. Concurrent Plan

Concurrently with development of family case plan and improvement period, the Department may commence efforts to place the child for adoption or other permanent placement in the event that reunification attempts fail. Rule 23(a).

C. Length of Pre-adjudicatory Improvement Period

A pre-adjudicatory improvement period shall not exceed three months. The court shall further order that a status conference shall be conducted within 60 days of the granting of the improvement period; or that the Department submit a status report to the court within 60 days and a status conference shall be conducted within 90 days of the award of the improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(1)(C); Rule 23(b).

D. Progress Reports

The court may require or accept progress reports or statements from other persons, including the parties, service providers, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, provided that such reports or statements are provided to all parties. Rule 23(b).

IV. ADJUDICATORY PRE-HEARING CONFERENCE

The court may convene an adjudicatory pre-hearing conference on its own motion or upon the motion of any party in preparation for the adjudicatory hearing. Rule 24. A final pre-hearing conference may be scheduled within five days in advance of the adjudicatory hearing to determine that proper notice has been provided and any other matter affecting the hearing. Rule 24(d).

V. ADJUDICATORY HEARING

A. Timing -- No Pre-adjudicatory Improvement Period

If temporary custody has been ordered, an adjudicatory hearing shall commence within 30 days of entry of the temporary custody order following the preliminary hearing unless a pre-adjudicatory improvement period has been ordered. Rule 25. If temporary custody has not been ordered, an adjudicatory hearing shall commence within 30 days of the filing of the petition.

B. Timing -- Pre-adjudicatory Improvement Period

An adjudicatory hearing held at the end of a pre-adjudicatory improvement period shall be held as close in time as possible after the end of the improvement period and shall be held within 30 days of the termination of such improvement period. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601(j); 49-4-610(8); Rule 25.

C. Procedure for Adjudicatory Hearing

1. Where a respondent has been served, no order adjudicating that such respondent has abused or neglected the child shall be entered until the time for answer for such respondent has expired and, if the answer is timely served, the respondent has been afforded at least 20 days from the date the answer was filed to prepare for adjudication or has waived such opportunity to prepare. Rule 25.

2. The adjudicatory hearing shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-4-601(h). The parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses.

3. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. A transcript or recording shall be made of all proceedings unless waived by all parties to the proceeding. The rules of evidence shall apply. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k). Any stipulated or uncontested adjudication should conform to Rule 26. It should include agreed upon facts supporting court involvement and a statement of the problems or deficiencies to be addressed at the final disposition hearing.

4. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. If applicable, the court may find that a parent is a non-abusing parent because he or she is a battered parent or because he or she did not knowingly allow abuse. W. Va. Code § 49-1-201. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof. W. Va. Code §§ 49-1-201; 49-4-601(i); Rule 27.

5. The court shall enter an order including findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether the child is abused or neglected, within ten days of the conclusion of the hearing, and the parties and all other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard shall be given notice of the entry of this order. Rule 27.

6. When a child has been placed in the custody of the Department or custodial responsibilities have been altered, the court shall set the amount of the child support obligation according to the child support guidelines. Rule 16a.

VI. POST-ADJUDICATORY OR DISPOSITIONAL IMPROVEMENT PERIOD

A. Grounds for Improvement Period

After finding that a child is an abused or neglected child, a court may grant a respondent an improvement period not to exceed six months when: 1) the respondent files a written motion requesting the improvement period; 2) the respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period; and 3) the court makes a finding, on the record, that the respondent has not previously been granted an improvement period or, has shown that since the granting of an initial improvement period, the respondent has experienced a substantial change of circumstances and that due to such change respondent is likely to fully participate in a further improvement period. Further, the court should make a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(2) and (3).

B. Family Case Plan

If a post-adjudicatory or dispositional improvement period is granted, the court shall order the Department to submit a family case plan within 30 days of the order. Concurrent efforts may be made by the Department to place the child for adoption or secure other permanent placement. Rule 37.

C. Initial Review Hearing

When the improvement period is granted, the court shall order that a hearing be held to review the matter within 60 days of the granting of the improvement period; or, order that a hearing be held to review the matter within 90 days of the granting of the improvement period and that the Department shall submit a report as to the respondent parents' progress in the improvement period within 60 days of the order granting the improvement period. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-610(2)(C) and (3)(C); 49-4-110; Rule 37.

D. Subsequent Review Hearing

The court shall thereafter convene a status conference at least once every three months for the duration of the improvement period. At the status conference, the MDT shall attend and report as to progress and developments in the case. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-610(2)(C) and (3)(C); 49-4-110; Rule 37.

E. Extension

A court may extend an improvement period for a period not to exceed three months when the court finds that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period will not substantially impair the ability of the Department to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(6).

F. Revocation or Termination of Improvement Period

Upon the motion by any party, the court shall terminate any improvement period when the court finds that the respondent has failed to fully participate in the terms of the improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(7).

VII. DISPOSITION HEARING

A. Timing -- After Adjudicatory Hearing

A disposition hearing shall commence within 45 days of the entry of the adjudicatory order. Rule 32(a). Notice of the date, time and place of the disposition hearing shall be given by the court to all parties, their counsel, and the other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. Rule 31. All persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard shall be provided with the child's case plan, as defined in Rule 28, and material from other parties necessary to preparation of their case at least five judicial days before the dispositional hearing. Rules 29 and 30.

B. Accelerated Disposition Hearing

The disposition hearing may immediately follow the adjudication hearing if: 1) all the parties agree; 2) a child's case plan meeting the requirements of West Virginia Code § 49-4-604 and § 49-4-408 was completed and provided to the court or the party or the parties have waived the requirement that the child's case plan be submitted prior to disposition; and 3) notice of the dispositional hearing was provided to or waived by all parties. Rule 32(b).

C. Timing -- After Dispositional Improvement Period

When a disposition improvement period has been awarded as an alternative to final disposition, a final disposition hearing shall be held no later than 30 days after the end of the disposition improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8)(B); Rule 38.

D. Legal Authority: Uncontested/Contested Disposition

If a parent voluntarily relinquishes parental rights or termination of parental rights is uncontested, the disposition hearing should conform to Rule 35(a). See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-607. Contested terminations and contests to case plans are governed by Rule 35(b).

E. Disposition Order: Contents

At the conclusion of the final disposition hearing, the court shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law in accordance with West Virginia Code § 49-4-604 and Rule 36. At disposition, the court may terminate parental rights when warranted by the evidence. The court may commit the child to the permanent sole custody of a non-abusing parent, including a parent who has been found to be a battered parent. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6).

F. Entry of Disposition Order

Within ten days of the conclusion of the final disposition hearing, the court shall enter a disposition order. Rule 38.

VIII. PERMANENCY HEARING

A. Purpose

The purpose of the permanency hearing is to determine the permanency plan and determine what efforts are necessary to provide the child with a permanent home. W. Va. Code § 49-4-608; Rule 36a. The court has exclusive jurisdiction to determine the permanent placement of a child. Rule 36(e).

B. Timing -- Reasonable Efforts Required

If the court finds, at any stage of the proceedings, that the Department must make reasonable efforts to preserve the family or any part of the family, then a permanency hearing must be held within 12 months of when the Department obtained physical custody of a child.[3] W. Va. Code § 49-4-608. The court is also required to conduct permanency hearings for "transitioning adults." W. Va. Code § 49-4-110(c). If permanency has been achieved by the adoption of a child, the establishment of a legal guardianship, permanent placement with a fit and willing relative, or another planned, permanent living arrangement before this 12-month period has elapsed, it is not necessary for the court to conduct an additional hearing designated as a "permanency hearing." See Chapter 3, Section XII. B. for a discussion of permanency hearing requirements.

C. Timing -- Reasonable Efforts Not Required

If the court finds that the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, then a permanency hearing must be held within 30 days to determine the permanency plan for the child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-608; Rule 36a(a).

[3] Rule 36a(b) has incorporated the slightly longer federal standard for the timing of a permanency hearing, and it provides that a permanency hearing must be conducted within one year of the earlier of: 1) the date of the adjudication of abuse or neglect, or 2) the date that is 60 days after the child's removal from the home. Rule 36a(b). If a court conducts a permanency hearing according to the slightly shorter period established by West Virginia Code § 49-4-608, the court will automatically meet the federal standard.

D. Additional Permanency Hearings

After the initial permanency hearing, the court must conduct a permanency hearing every 12 months for a child or "transitioning adult" who remains in the legal and physical custody of the Department. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-608(b); 49-4-110.

IX. PERMANENT PLACEMENT REVIEW

A. MDT Responsibilities

The court, with the assistance of the MDT, shall continue to monitor implementation of the court-ordered permanency plan for the child or "transitioning adult" every three months until permanent placement as defined in Rule 3 is achieved. Rules 39 and 41; W. Va. Code § 49-4-110. The court shall conduct a review conference and require the MDT to attend and report the progress towards achieving a permanent placement for the child. The MDT and Department shall provide permanent placement review reports to the court at least ten days before the review conference. Rule 40.

B. Notice

The notice of the time and place of the permanent placement review conference shall be given to counsel and all other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard at least 15 days prior to the conference unless otherwise provided by court order. Neither a party whose parental rights have been terminated by the disposition order nor his or her attorney shall be given notice of or the right to participate in post-disposition proceedings. The court shall hold a hearing in connection with such review and shall not merely conduct reviews by agreed order. Rule 39(c) and (d).

C. Issues Subject to Review

If the court finds that permanent placement has not been achieved, the court's order shall address those subjects set forth in Rules 41 and 42(c). Permanent placement of each child shall be achieved within 12 months of the disposition order, unless the court specifically finds on the record extraordinary reasons sufficient to justify the delay. Rule 43.

D. Timing for Entry of Order

Within ten days of the conclusion of the permanent placement review conference, the court shall enter an order determining whether permanent placement has been fully achieved within the meaning of Rule 6 and stating findings of fact and conclusions of law to support its determination. Rule 42(a).

E. Dismissal

If the court finds that permanent placement has been achieved, it may order the case dismissed from the docket. Rule 42(b).

PRELIMINARY HEARING CHECKLIST

A. Notice and Appointments

1. Have all parties and persons entitled to notice and a right to be heard received timely notice of the hearing, pursuant to Rule 20? (This includes noncustodial parents, putative fathers and custodial relatives.) (If only one parent served, see Rule 21.)

2. Has counsel been appointed for the child and is that counsel present in court for the hearing? W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

3. Has a CASA been appointed and is that CASA present in court for the hearing? Rule 52.

4. If parents or other parties have counsel, is such counsel present in court for the hearing? If the parents or other parties do not already have counsel, advise them of their right to counsel, and appoint such counsel as needed. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f). (See Overview Section IV. F.)

B. Temporary Custody and Placement

1. Should the child be returned home immediately or, based upon finding no alternative less drastic than removal, kept in an out-of-home placement prior to adjudication?
W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b).

2. What services, if any, would allow the child to remain safely at home? W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a)(1)(B).

3. Will the parties voluntarily agree to participate in such services?

4. If removal ordered, what services should be provided by the Department, if any, to facilitate the child's return home? W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b)(5).

5. Are any protective orders necessary or appropriate?

6. Are orders needed for examinations, evaluations or other immediate services? W. Va. Code § 49-4-603.

7. If removal is being ordered, make finding that continuation in the home is contrary to the child's best interests, and provide specific reasons for such finding. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b)(1). (See pages 2-23 to 2-24 of Title IV-E Checklist.)

8. If removal is being ordered, make findings as to whether the Department made reasonable efforts to prevent removal of the child, or that such reasonable efforts were not possible or not required, and provide specific reasons for such findings. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b) & (d); W. Va. Code § 49-4-105. (See pages 2-24 to 2-25 of Title IV-E Checklist.)

9. Are there any responsible relatives or other responsible adults who are familiar with the child or family, who are available to serve as foster parents?

10. Does the Indian Child Welfare Act apply? (See Special Procedures Section IX.)

11. Is the placement proposed by the Department the least disruptive and most family-like setting that meets the needs of the child?

C. Other

1. Has the MDT met, or scheduled a meeting within 30 days of the filing of the petition? W. Va. Code § 49-4-405 and Rule 51(a).

2. If removal has been ordered, is visitation with parents or other close relatives consistent with the child's well-being and best interests, and if so, what are appropriate terms and conditions of such visitation? Rule 15.

3. Has petitioner's counsel provided the required disclosures and discovery? Rule 10(b).

4. If removal ordered, what should the terms of any child support order be? W. Va. Code § 49-4-801(c) – (e). If not already done in conjunction with an earlier removal order, the affected respondents should be ordered to complete and return to the Department the financial statement forms for child support and Title IV-D and IV-E eligibility. The affected respondents should also be required to complete the forms to determine eligibility for court-appointed counsel. Rules 16a and 17(c)(5) (See Special Procedures Section VII.)

D. Actions

1. Mark and admit any reports and exhibits.

2. Set date for next hearing or conference:

a) If no pre-adjudicatory improvement period is granted, set adjudicatory hearing within the time frames applicable to the circumstances, as set forth in Rule 25;

b) If pre-adjudicatory improvement period is granted, set status conference within the time frames applicable to the circumstances, as set forth in Rule 25.

3. Enter preliminary hearing order, with findings to include matters set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-4-602(b) and, if applicable, § 49-4-602(d).

4. Determine whether to set adjudicatory prehearing conference. Rule 24.

ADJUDICATORY HEARING CHECKLIST

A. Service And Notice

1. Have all necessary parties been served?

2. If personal service not obtained on any parent or other custodian, ascertain and place on record whether "due diligence" efforts made under West Virginia Code § 49-4-601(e). See Rule 21.

B. Stipulated or Uncontested Adjudication

1. Stipulated or uncontested adjudication must include:

   a) Facts supporting adjudication (which may incorporate writeen reports and admissions by a respondent in an answer and any written stipulation); and

   b) Statement of a respondent's problems or deficiencies to be addressed at final disposition. Rule 26(a), (c) and (d).

2. Did the respondent understand the stipulation and the consequences of agreeing to a stipulation? Did the respondent voluntarily enter into the stipulation? Rule 26(b).

C. Other Matters To Be Addressed

1. If adjudication is contested, was alleged abuse or neglect existing at the time of the filing of the petition proven by clear and convincing evidence? W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i). If not, petition to be dismissed.

2. Is one or more of the respondents a non-abusing parent because he or she is a battered parent or because he or she did not knowingly fail to take protective action in the face of abuse by another person? W. Va. Code § 49-1-201.

3. If abuse or neglect found, consider other issues that may need to be addressed before disposition, such as:

a) Continuing child placement;

b) Further evaluations, examinations or services;

c) Any appropriate protective orders;

d) Parental or sibling visitation as permitted under Rule 15.

4. If abuse or neglect found, direct the Department to prepare the child case plan, including the permanency plan, and (where applicable) the family case plan. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(a); Rule 28.

5. If removal ordered, what should the terms of any child support order be? If not already done in conjunction with an earlier removal order, the affected respondents should be ordered to complete and return to the Department the financial statement forms for child support and Title IV-D and IV-E eligibility. Rule 16a and Rule 17(c)(5). W. Va. Code § 49-4-801. (See Special Procedures Section VII.)

6. Does the Indian Child Welfare Act apply? (See Special Procedures Section IX.)

7. Inquire on record whether respondents desire appeal. If so, direct preparation of transcript. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k).

D. Actions

1. Mark and admit any reports and exhibits.

2. Enter adjudication order with findings of fact and conclusions of law within ten days of hearing, with notice of entry to all parties and other persons entitled to notice and right to be heard. Rule 27.

3. Set date for next hearing or conference:

a) Facts supporting adjudication (which may incorporate disposition hearing within the 45-day time frame set forth in Rule 32; and

b) Facts supporting adjudication (which may incorporate status conference within the time frames applicable to the circumstances, as set forth in Rule 37.

DISPOSITION HEARING CHECKLIST

A. Notice and Procedure

1. Have all parties, counsel and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard been given notice of the hearing? Rule 31.

2. Has the Department prepared and filed the child's case plan that complies with Rule 28? See W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(a).

3. Has the child's case plan been provided to the parties, their counsel, and persons entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard at least five judicial days prior to the hearing? Rule 29.

4. Has the MDT developed an individualized service plan for the child and provided such to the Court prior to disposition? W. Va. Code § 49-4-404 and -405. (See Overview Section VI.)

5. Have the parties each submitted to the court, other parties, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, a witness list and a list of legal and factual issues at least five judicial days prior to the hearing? Rule 30.

B. Stipulated or Uncontested Dispositions

1. Does the proposed stipulated or uncontested disposition comply with Rule 33(a)?

2. Is the stipulation understood and voluntary? Rule 33(b).

3. If a parent intends to relinquish his or her parental rights, does the relinquishment satisfy the requirements of West Virginia Code § 49-4-607?

4. If the parent has voluntarily relinquished parental rights or if a parent does not contest termination, have the requirements of Rule 35(a) been met?

C. Contested Dispositions

If a disposition involving termination is contested and opposed:

a) Have findings been made under West Virginia Code § 49-4-604(b)(6) and, if applicable, § 49-4-604(b)(7)?

b) Should permanent sole custody of the child be awarded to a non-abusing parent, including a non-abusing parent who is a battered parent? W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6).

c) Does the case plan require amendment in light of disposition findings made? Rule 35(b).

d) Do any parties or persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard desire modification to the child's case plan, or have they offered a substitute child's case plan? If so, follow the hearing requirements set forth in Rule 35(b)(2).

D. Items To Be Considered In All Cases Involving Temporary Custody Or Termination

1. Are there objections to the child's case plan? If so, the court must enter an order in compliance with Rule 34.

2. If removal is being ordered, make finding that continuation in the home is contrary to the child's best interests, and provide specific reasons for such finding. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(5). (See pages 2-23 to 2-24 of Title IV-E Checklist.)

3. If removal is being ordered, make findings as to whether the Department made reasonable efforts to prevent removal of the child, or that such reasonable efforts not possible or not required, and provide specific reasons for such findings. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-604(b)(5),(7); 49-4-105. (See pages 2-24 to 2-25 of Title IV-E Checklist.)

4. If termination of parental rights is considered and the child is age 14 or older or otherwise of an age of discretion, has the court been informed of the child's wishes with regard to the termination of parental rights? W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)(C).

5. If no permanency hearing was conducted with the disposition hearing (or earlier), then a permanency hearing should be scheduled within the time frames set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-4-608.

6. If removal ordered, what should the terms of any child support order be? If not already done in conjunction with an earlier removal order, the affected respondents should be ordered to complete and return to the Department the financial statement forms for child support and Title IV-D and IV-E eligibility. Rule 16a and Rule 17(c)(5). W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-604(b)(5) and 49-4-801. (See Special Procedures Section VII.)

E. Actions

1. Mark and admit any reports and exhibits.

2. Make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to the appropriate disposition under West Virginia Code § 49-4-604, or under West Virginia Code § 49-4-610(3) if an improvement period is granted as an initial disposition.

3. If the court determines not to adopt the MDT's recommended service plan for the child (if such plan was provided by the MDT prior to disposition), schedule and hold a hearing within ten days to consider evidence from the MDT as to its rationale for the proposed service plan. W.Va. Code § 49-4-404.

4. If a disposition improvement period is granted, order the preparation of the family case plan within 30 days, and set a status conference within the 60 or 90-day time frames provided under Rule 37.

5. Following final disposition hearing, enter disposition order containing the items set forth in Rule 36(c) within ten days of the hearing.

6. The final disposition order shall also set the date and time of the permanency hearing under West Virginia Code § 49-4-608, or if the permanency plan is already in place, a permanent placement review conference under Rule 36(b) within 90 days.

IMPROVEMENT PERIOD CHECKLIST

A. Requirements of Pre-Adjudicatory Improvement Period

1. A written motion filed at any time prior to the adjudication hearing.

2. Respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that he or she is likely to fully participate in improvement period; and findings made, on the record, of the terms of improvement period.

3. Has there been acknowledgment by the parent seeking an improvement period that abuse/neglect has occurred, and/or has requesting parent identified abuser? DHHR v. Doris S., 475 S.E.2d 865 (W. Va. 1996).

4. Court orders hearing to be held to review the matter within 60 days of granting improvement period OR court orders hearing to be held to review the matter within 90 days of the granting of improvement period and orders the Department to submit a progress report in 60 days of the order granting improvement period.

5. Order requires Department to prepare and submit a family case plan that complies with West Virginia Code § 49-4-408.

6. Improvement period not to exceed a period of three months, with no extensions allowed. W.Va. Code § 49-4-610(1) and Rule23.

B. Requirements of Post-Adjudicatory Improvement Period and Disposition Improvement Period

1. A written motion filed following adjudicatory hearing and prior to disposition hearing.

2. Respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that he or she is likely to fully participate in improvement period; and findings made, on the record, of the terms of improvement period.

3. Court orders hearing to be held to review the matter within 60 days of granting improvement period OR court orders hearing to be held to review the matter within 90 days of the granting of improvement period and orders the Department to submit a progress report in 60 days of the order granting improvement period.

4. No previous improvement period has been granted, or respondent demonstrates by clear and convincing evidence that a substantial change of circumstances has occurred and that respondent is now likely to fully participate in a further improvement period.

5. The order requires Department to prepare and submit a family case plan that complies with West Virginia Code § 49-4-408.

6. Improvement period can be no longer than six months, unless later extended as set forth below. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(2),(3); Rule 37.

C. Other Matters

1. The Department may be ordered to pay expenses associated with any improvement period services when respondent is unable to bear such expenses. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-610(4)(A) and 49-4-108.

2. With respect to any improvement period, respondent is required to execute a release of all medical information regarding that respondent. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(4)(B).

3. With respect to a post-adjudicatory improvement period or a disposition improvement period, the court may extend such improvement period for a period not to exceed three months upon finding that respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that continuation will not substantially impair the ability of the Department to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(6).

4. No combination of improvement periods or extensions should result in a child remaining in foster care for more than 15 months of the most recent 22 months unless the court finds compelling circumstances that it is in the child's best interests to extend this time limit. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(9).

5. Any party may move to revoke an improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(7).

6. Any hearing scheduled for the end of the improvement period shall be held as close in time possible at the end of the improvement period, and it shall be held no later than 30 days after the conclusion or termination of the improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8)(B).

PERMANENCY HEARING CHECKLIST

A. Notice and Procedure

1. Has notice of at least five judicial days been provided to any parents whose rights have not been terminated, any foster parent, preadoptive parent or relative who provides care for the child, any party, the child's attorney and the child, if the child is 12 years of age or older? Rule 36a; W. Va. Code § 49-4-608.

2. Has the Department filed a report that details its efforts to place the child in a permanent home and has the report been provided to any parent whose rights have not been terminated, other parties, the child's guardians, foster parents, any preadoptive parent, any relative providing care for the child, the child's attorney and the child if he or she is of 12 years of age or older?

3. If the child is 12 years of age or older, is he or she present or has his or her presence been waived by the child's attorney at the child's request or because the child would suffer emotional harm?

4. Are any of the following persons, in addition to any parties, present: any foster parent, any preadoptive parent or any relative providing care for the child?

B. Discuss

1. Has the court found that the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family? See W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(a); Rule 36a. For a list of circumstances in which the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, see West Virginia Code §§ 49-4-604(b)(7); 49-4-605. If so, has the permanency hearing been conducted within 30 days of such a finding?

2. If the Department was required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, has 12 months elapsed since the Department received physical custody of the child? W.Va. Code §§ 49-4-608(b);[4] 49-4-110.

3. If an initial permanency hearing has been conducted, has 12 months elapsed while the child has remained in the physical or legal custody of the Department? W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(b).

4. What is the appropriate permanent placement for the child and the likely date for the achievement of permanency? Rule 36a.

5. Under what conditions should the child's commitment to the Department continue? W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(b).

6. What efforts are necessary to provide a child with a permanent home? W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(b).

7. Has the Department made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan for the child in a timely manner? W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(e), Rule 42.

8. Identify any services the child needs. W.Va. Code § 49-4-608(e).

9. If the child will be placed in an out-of-state placement, is such a placement in the child's best interest? Is there an in-state facility or program that would meet the child's needs? W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(d).

10. If a child has reached 14 years of age, what services does the child need to make the transition from foster care to [4] Rule 36a incorporated the slightly longer federal standard for the scheduling of a permanency hearing. See 42 U.S.C. § 675(c)(5). If a court meets the standard for a permanency hearing established by West Virginia Code § 49-4-608, the court will also meet the federal timeline for conducting a permanency hearing set forth in Rule 36a.

11. If a youth is aged 17 or older, has a personalized transition plan been developed? Rules 28(c)(8).

C. Actions

1. Schedule next permanent placement review. Rule 36a(c).

2. Mark and admit any reports and exhibits.

3. Enter order within ten days that addresses the subjects noted above. W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(e), Rule 41 and Rule 42.

PERMANENT PLACEMENT REVIEW CHECKLIST

A. Notice and Procedure

1. Has 15-day notice been provided to the parties, counsel, and other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard? Rule 39(c).

2. Has the permanency hearing been conducted, with a permanency plan for the child determined? W. Va. Code § 49-4-608; Rule 36a.

3. Has the Department and the MDT prepared and filed with the court a progress report describing the efforts to implement the permanency plan and any obstacles to permanent placement? Rule 40; W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(b).

4. Were copies of the progress reports provided to the parties and others ten days in advance of the review conference? Rule 40.

5. Are there any progress reports or statements from other persons, including the parties, CASA, or any service providers, and if so, have such reports or statements been provided in advance to all parties? Rule 40.

B. Discuss

1. Has permanent placement been achieved? If so, dismissal of the case is proper. Rule 42(b).

2. Have reasonable efforts been made to finalize permanency plan in effect and secure a permanent placement, including all items set forth in Rule 41(a)?

3. What changes should be made to the child's case plan to effect a permanent placement? Rule 42(c)(1).

4. What other changes should be made, or actions taken, to accomplish permanent placement? Rule 42(c)(2-7).

5. If a youth is aged 14 or older, have services been identified to assist the youth with transition to adulthood? If a youth is aged 17 or older, has a personalized transition plan been developed? Rules 28(c)(8) and 42(c)(5).

6. Will permanent placement be achieved within 12 months of the final disposition order? If not, what extraordinary reasons justify delay? Rule 43.

7. Is the youth a transitioning adult as defined in West Virginia Code § 49-1-202 and subject to the review requirements of West Virginia Code § 49-4-110?

8. Should the annual permanency hearing be scheduled concurrently with the next permanent placement review? See W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-608; 49-4-110.

C. Actions

1. If no permanent placement yet achieved, set date for next review conference (within three months). Rules 39 and 42(c)(8).

2. Mark and admit any reports and exhibits.

3. Enter order within ten days regarding whether permanent placement has been achieved, and making findings of fact and conclusions of law in support thereof. Rule 42.

VI. Contrary-To-Welfare and Reasonable Efforts Findings

CASELAW DIGEST

XIV. Dispositional Hearing

XV. Placement with a Parent

XVIII. Achievement of Permanency

XIX. Children's Right to Continued Association

TITLE IV-E FINDINGS CHECKLISTS

Contrary to Welfare or Best Interests (CW)

A. When Required

1. First order that sanctions child's removal (even temporarily) from family home.

2. Any return to out-of-home placement after a "trial home visit" (e.g. improvement period) exceeding the time period deemed appropriate by the court, would be considered a new removal requiring CW findings.

3. A removal has not occurred when an order removes legal custody from parents but child remains in home with agency discretion for removal. At the time of any subsequent actual removal from the home, another hearing and order with CW findings would be necessary. See Rule 16(d).

B. What Required

1. Court must find on a case-specific basis whether:

a) remaining in the home would be contrary to the welfare of the child, and if so, why; or

b) out-of-home placement is in the child's best interest, and if so, why.

2. CW finding must be supported by specific facts/reasons summarized in order:

a) by court's own wording; or

b) by selecting applicable items from a detailed checklist; or

c) by cross-reference to matters in the petition or in a report submitted to the court.

C. Comments

1. First removal order must contain the required CW findings, even if initial placement is not IV-E eligible.

2. Absence of appropriate findings in first removal order makes child ineligible for IV-E funding throughout entire custody period.

a) Only acceptable substitute would be hearing transcript showing findings were made.

b) Nunc pro tunc orders not acceptable substitute.

Best Practice Include CW findings in every order making an out-of-home placement of the child.

Reasonable Efforts to Prevent Removal (RE-PR)

A. When Required

1. Within 60 days of child's removal from home.

2. Any return to out-of-home placement after a "trial home visit" (e.g. improvement period) exceeding the time period deemed appropriate by the court, would be considered a new removal requiring RE-PR findings.

3. A removal has not occurred when an order removes legal custody from parents but child remains in home with agency discretion for removal. At the time of any subsequent actual removal from the home (or within 60 days thereafter) another hearing and order with RE-PR findings would be necessary. See Rule 16(d).

B. What Required

1. Court must find on a case-specific basis:

   a) whether reasonable efforts were made to prevent the child's initial removal from the home; or

   b) that due to an emergency situation or imminent risk involving the safety or well-being of the child, it is reasonable under present circumstances to make no effort to maintain the child in the home; or

   c) that reasonable efforts were not required in child abuse or neglect case due to aggravated circumstances, commission of specified crimes, the parent is required to register as a sex offender under state or federal law or prior involuntary termination of parental rights regarding a sibling. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(7).

2. RE-PR finding must be supported by specific facts/reasons summarized in order:

   a) by court's own wording; or

   b) by selecting applicable items from a detailed checklist; or

   c) by cross-reference to matters in the petition or in a report submitted to the court.

C. Comments

1. Even though the RE-PR determination may be in any order within 60 days following initial removal, the findings must relate to efforts prior to the actual removal.

2. If reasonable efforts information is unavailable at the time of initial removal order, make sure a follow-up order with these findings is made within 60 days.

3. Absence of appropriate findings in either first removal order or another order within 60 days makes child ineligible for IV-E funding throughout entire custody period.

Best Practice Include RE-PR findings in every order making an out-of-home

a) Only acceptable substitute would be hearing transcript showing findings were made.

b) Nunc pro tunc orders not acceptable substitute.

Reasonable Efforts to Finalize Permanency in a Timely Manner (RE-FP)

A. When Required

1. Within 12 months of the date the child is "considered to have entered foster care" and at least once every 12 months thereafter. For the purpose of calculating the initial 12-month period under federal law, a child is considered to have entered foster care either 60 days following the child's removal from home, or on the date the court made a finding that the child was abused or neglected, whichever date comes first. If the court makes this finding at a permanency hearing scheduled according to West Virginia Code § 49-4-604(b)(7), one year after receipt of physical custody of a child, it will automatically meet the federal standard.

2. If the court determines at any stage of the case that reasonable efforts to return the child home are not required due to aggravated circumstances, commission of a crime, a requirement to register as a sex offender under state or federal law, or prior sibling TPR [W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(7)], a permanency hearing must be held within 30 days of that determination, unless permanency hearing requirements are fulfilled at the same hearing where the no-reasonable-efforts-to-reunify determination was made.

Note: If the court makes this finding at any stage of the proceeding, then the initial permanency hearing must be held within 30 days of entry of the order containing that finding. Rule 36a.

B. What Required

1. Court must find on a case-specific basis:

   a) whether reasonable efforts have been made to finalize the permanency plan in a timely manner (reunification if possible, or adoption, legal guardianship, or placement with a non-abusive parent or other fit and willing relative).

2. RE-FP finding must be supported by specific facts/reasons summarized in order:

   a) by court's own wording; or

   b) by selecting applicable items from a detailed checklist; or

   c) by cross-reference to matters in a report submitted to the court.

3. Court must document a compelling reason for rejecting the ASFA-preferred permanency options (reunification, adoption, legal guardianship, placement with a non-abusive parent or other fit and willing relative) before accepting any other planned permanent living arrangement, such as independent living or long-term foster care. [Examples appear in the Comments below.]

C. Comments

1. If a court orders a placement with a specific provider, without bona fide consideration of the agency's recommendation regarding a different placement, the court has assumed the State agency's placement responsibility, and the child may be disallowed IV-E funding for that placement. This does not mean the court must always concur with the agency's recommendation in order for the child's placement to be eligible for IV-E funding. As long as the court hears the relevant testimony, works with the parties and agency, and makes findings in arriving at what the court determines the appropriate placement decision, IV-E funding should not be disallowed.

2. Absence of appropriate finding, reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan in a timely manner, within each 12-month interval will make the child ineligible for additional IV-E funding until the court makes such determination.

3. Examples of compelling reason for establishing a permanency plan other than an ASFA-preferred option:

Best Practice
Include RE-FP findings in every placement review order once the permanency plan is established.

a) Older teen who does not wish to proceed with TPR, and requests that emancipation be established as the permanency plan.

b) Parent and child with significant bond but parent unable to care for child due to physical or emotional disability and child's foster parents are committed to raising child and facilitating visitation with disabled parent.

Best Interests in Voluntary Placement (BI-VP)

A. When Required

1. Within 180 days of child's voluntary placement in foster care.

B. What Required

1. Court must find whether the continued voluntary placement is in the best interests of the child.

C. Comments

1. Absence of appropriate finding within the 180-day initial period will make the placement ineligible for additional federal financial participation for foster care expenditures.

Best Practice Include BI-VP finding in first quarterly judicial review order.

CHECKLIST: INFANT AND TODDLER CARE*

A. Physical Health

1. Has the child received a comprehensive health assessment since entering foster care?

2. Are the child's immunizations complete and up-to-date for his or her age?

3. Has the child received a hearing and vision screen?

4. Has the child been screened for lead exposure?

5. Has the child received regular dental services?

6. Has the child been screened for communicable diseases?

* Reproduced with permission from the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges, Reno, Nevada.

7. Does the child have a "medical home" where he or she can receive coordinated, comprehensive, continuous health care?

B. Developmental Health

1. Has the child received a development evaluation by a provider with experience in child development?

2. Are the child and his or her family receiving the necessary early intervention services, e.g., speech therapy, occupational therapy, educational interventions, family support?

C. Mental Health

1. Has the child received a mental health screening, assessment, or evaluation?

2. Is the child receiving necessary infant mental health services?

D. Educational/Childcare Setting

1. Is the child enrolled in a high-quality early childhood program?

2. Is the early childhood program knowledgeable about the needs of children in the child welfare system?

E. Placement

1. Is the child placed with caregivers knowledgeable about the social and emotional needs of infants and toddlers in out-of-home placements, especially young children who have been abused, exposed to violence, or neglected?

2. Do the caregivers have access to information and support related to the child's unique needs?

3. Are the foster parents able to identify problem behaviors in the child and seek appropriate services?

4. Are all efforts being made to keep the child in one consistent placement?

CHECKLIST: INTERSTATE COMPACT ON THE PLACEMENT OF CHILDREN

1. Treat Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (ICPC) cases as concurrent planning cases. W. Va. Code §§ 49-7-101, et seq. For example, direct the DHHR to pursue the ICPC process even when seeking to reunite the child and the parent.

2. Enter foster care orders immediately upon conclusion of placement hearings. The order must be included with the ICPC package.

3. Direct lawyers and CASA to promptly inform the court when interstate movement (e.g., placement with out-of-state relatives) is a possibility.

4. Direct the DHHR to give potential placement resources forms to the parents and other parties at the beginning of the court process, so they can provide required information for the agency to consider. Have these forms available at court as well.

5. Enter detailed ICPC orders once it is determined that interstate placement should be pursued.

   a. Determine if the case is a Regulation 7 (priority placement) case and, if so, immediately enter the order. If timelines are not met in Regulation 7 cases, take action by contacting the appropriate judicial officer in the receiving state.

   b. Set timelines for action by the DHHR office and by the state ICPC office (such as strict timelines for when DHHR caseworker must submit the ICPC packet to the West Virginia ICPC office).

   c. Establish a report-back mechanism so you know when actions have occurred. For example, identify a responsible party - prosecutor, caseworker, lawyer for child/parent - to check on ICPC progress at least 7 days prior to hearings and have that party file a report with the court, copying all parties/counsel.

   d. Schedule hearings for updates on progress of the ICPC no more than 30 days after it is determined that interstate placement should be pursued to:

      i. Determine status of home study by receiving state.

      ii. Determine education/medical/financial needs for child.

6. When ICPC progress slows, determine the cause and seek a solution.

a. Speak with the local caseworker and counsel for the parties in open court.

b. With the consent of all parties and counsel, or in an open process where they can participate:

i. Call your state ICPC office.

ii. Call the receiving state ICPC office.

iii. Call a local judge in the other state where child is going seek his/her help either informally (e.g., by calling local agency to inquire about reason for delay) or formally through available UCCJEA methods (see 8 below).

7. Obtain the contact information regarding 6b. above from the Supreme Court website for the receiving state, from the Conference of State Court Administrators ICPC contact list:

(http://cosca.ncsc.dni.us/statecourtpointsofcontact.html), or from the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges (http://www.ncjfcj.org).

8. The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) applies to child abuse and neglect proceedings in this state (W. Va. Code § 48-20-102(d)). Before calling a judge in the receiving state, check to verify that the receiving state also has UCCJEA (or UCCJA), and that the receiving state's version of the law applies to abuse and neglect cases. (Check most current Table of Jurisdictions at Part 1 of W. Va. Code, Chap. 48, art. 20, or Uniform Law Commission website at http://www.uniformlaws.org).

a. Make sure the judge in the other state understands that the UCCJEA (or UCCJA) applies.

b. Discuss the portions of the UCCJEA that apply to assistance one court may provide to the other and propose a method to get the placement delay resolved. See W. Va. Code § 48-20-112.

c. Also reference, if necessary, the federal Safe and Timely Interstate Placement of Foster Children Act (effective July 3, 2006) and the requirement that the home study must be completed by the receiving state in 60 days.

CHECKLIST: EDUCATIONAL NEEDS OF CHILDREN AND YOUTH IN FOSTER CARE*

I. GENERAL EDUCATION INFORMATION

A. Enrollment

1. Is the child or youth enrolled in school?

   -At which school is the child or youth enrolled?

   -In what type of school setting is the child or youth enrolled (e.g., specialized school)?

2. How long has the child or youth been attending his/her current school?

   -Where is this school located in relation to the child's or youth's foster care placement?

   -Were efforts made to continue school placement, where feasible?

* Asking the Right Questions: A Judicial Checklist to Ensure That the Educational Needs of Children and Youth in Foster Care Are Being Addressed, published by the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges, Reno, Nevada, © 2005. Reproduced with permission from the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges, Reno, Nevada.

3. If currently not in a school setting, what educational services is the child or youth receiving and from whom?

-Is the child or youth receiving homebound or home-schooled educational services?

-If Yes: Who is responsible for providing educational materials and what information is available about their quality?

-If Yes: How frequently are educational sessions taking place?

❒ What is the duration of each session? (e.g., how many hours?)

B. Provision of Supplies

1. Does the child or youth have appropriate clothing to attend school?

2. Does the child or youth have the necessary supplies and equipment (e.g., pens, notebooks, musical instrument) to be successful in school?

C. Transportation

1. How is the child or youth getting to and from school?

2. What entity (e.g., school, child welfare agency) is responsible for providing transportation?

D. Attendance

1. Is the child or youth regularly attending school?

2. Has the child or youth been expelled, suspended or excluded from school this year/ever?

-If Yes: How many times?

-Have proper due process procedures been followed for the expulsions, suspensions or exclusions from school?

-What was the nature/reason for the child's or youth's most recent expulsion, suspension or exclusion from school?

-How many days of school will the child or youth miss as a result of being expelled, suspended or excluded from school?

-If currently not attending school, what educational services is the child or youth receiving and from whom?

3. How many days of school has the child or youth missed this year?

-What is the reason for these absences?

-What steps have been taken to address these absences?

-Has the child or youth received any truancies, and if so, for how many days?

-Has the child or youth been tardy, and if so, for how many times?

E. Performance Level

1. When did the child or youth last receive an educational evaluation or assessment?

-How current is this educational evaluation or assessment?

-How comprehensive is this assessment?

2. At which grade level is this child or youth currently performing? [Is the child or youth academically on target?]

-Is this the appropriate grade level at which the child or youth should be functioning?

❒ If No: What is the appropriate grade level for this child or youth?

❒ Is there a specified plan in place to help this child or youth reach that level?

3. What is this child's or youth's current grade point average?

-If below average, what efforts are being made to address this issue?

4. Is the child or youth receiving any tutoring or other academic supportive services?

-If Yes: In which subjects?

II. TRACKING EDUCATION INFORMATION

1. Does this child or youth have a responsible adult serving as an educational advocate?

   -If Yes: Who is this adult?

   ❒ How long has this adult been advocating for the child's or youth's educational needs?

   ❒ How often does this adult meet with the child or youth?

   ❒ Does this adult attend scheduled meetings on behalf of the child or youth?

   -Is this adult effective as an advocate?

2. If there is no designated educational advocate, who ensures that the child's or youth's educational needs are being met?

   -Who is making sure that the child or youth is attending school?

   -Who gathers and communicates information about the child's or youth's educational history and needs?

   -Who is responsible for educational decision-making for the child or youth?

   -Who monitors the child's or youth's educational progress on an ongoing basis?

   -Who is notified by the school if the child or youth is absent (i.e., foster parent, social worker)?

   -Who could be appointed to advocate on behalf of the child or youth if his or her educational needs are not met?

III. CHANGE IN PLACEMENT/CHANGE IN SCHOOL

1. Has the child or youth experienced a change in schools as a result of a change in his or her foster care placement?

   -If Yes: How many times has this occurred?

   -What information, if any, has been provided to the child's or youth's new school about his or her needs?

-Did this change in foster care placement result in the child or youth missing any school?

❒ If Yes: How many days of school did the child or youth miss?

❒ Have any of these absences resulted in a truancy petition?

2. Were efforts made to maintain the child or youth in his or her original school despite foster care placement change?

IV. HEALTH FACTORS IMPACTING EDUCATION

A. Physical Health

1. Does the child or youth have any physical issues that impair his or her ability to learn, interact appropriately, or attend school regularly (e.g., hearing impairment, visual impairment)?

-If Yes: What is this physical issue?

❒ How is this physical issue impacting the child's or youth's education?

❒ How is this need being addressed?

B. Mental Health

1. Does the child or youth have any mental health issues that impair his or her ability to learn, interact appropriately, or attend school regularly?

-If Yes, what is this mental health issue?

❒ How is this mental health issue impacting the child's or youth's education?

❒ How is this need being addressed?

2. Is the child or youth currently being prescribed any psychotropic medications?

-If Yes: Which medications have been prescribed?

❒ Has the need for the child or youth to be taking this medication been clearly directly explained to him or her?

❒ How will this medication effect the child's or youth's educational experience?

C. Emotional Issues

1. Does the child or youth have any emotional issues that impair his or her ability to learn, interact appropriately, or attend school regularly?

-If Yes: What is this emotional issue?

❒ How is this emotional issue impacting the child's or youth's education?

❒ How is this need being addressed?

2. Is the child or youth experiencing any difficulty interacting with other children or youth at school (e.g., Does the child or youth have a network of friends? Has he or she experienced any difficulty with bullying?)

-If Yes: What is being done to address this issue?

D. Special Education and Related Services Under IDEA and Section 504

1. If the child or youth has a physical, mental health or emotional disability that impacts learning, has this child or youth (birth to age 21) been evaluated for Special Education/Section 504 eligibility and services?

-If No: Who will make a referral for evaluation or assessment?

-If Yes: What are the results of such an assessment?

❒ Have the assessment results been shared with the appropriate individuals at the school?

2. Does the child or youth have an appointed surrogate pursuant to IDEA (e.g., child's or youth's birth parent, someone else meeting the IDEA definition of parent, or an appointed surrogate parent)?

-If No: Who is the person that can best speak on behalf of the educational needs of the child or youth?

-Has the court used its authority to appoint a surrogate for the child or youth?

-Has the child's or youth's education decision-maker been informed of all information in the assessment and does that individual understand the results?

3. Does this child or youth have an Individualized Education Plan (IEP)?

-If Yes: Is the child's or youth's parent or caretaker cooperating in giving IEP information to the appropriate stakeholders or signing releases?

-Is this plan meeting the child's or youth's needs?

-Is the child's or youth's educational decision-maker fully participating in developing the IEP and do they agree with the plan?

4. Does this child or youth have a Section 504 Plan?

-If Yes: Is this plan meeting his or her needs?

-Is there an advocate for the child or youth participating in meetings and development of this plan?

V. EXTRACURRICULAR ACTIVITIES AND TALENTS

1. What are some identifiable areas in which the child or youth is excelling at school?

2. Is this child or youth involved in any extracurricular activities?

-If Yes: Which activities is the child or youth involved in?

❒ Are efforts being made to allow this child or youth to continue in his or her extracurricular activities (e.g., provision of transportation, additional equipment, etc.)?

3. Have any of the child's or youth's talents been identified?

-If Yes: What are these talents?

❒What efforts are being made to encourage the child or youth to pursue these talents?

VI. TRANSITIONING

1. Does the youth have an independent living plan?

-If Yes: Did the youth participate in developing this plan?

-Does this plan reflect the youth's goals?

-If Yes: Does the plan include participation in Chafee independent living services?

-Does this plan include vocational or post-secondary educational goals and preparation for the youth?

2. Is the youth receiving assistance in applying for post-secondary schooling or vocational training?

3. Is the youth being provided with information and assistance in applying for financial aid, including federally-funded Education and Training Vouchers (see Chafee Foster Care Independence Program)?

4. If the youth has an IEP, does it address transition issues?

-If Yes: What does this transition plan entail?

-Did the youth participate in developing the transition plan?

-Is this transition plan coordinated with the youth's independent living plan?

Practice Tip: When appropriate, consider addressing these questions directly to the children and youth.

See Rules 28, 41 and 42.

I. INTRODUCTION

The guiding purpose of child abuse and neglect laws is to provide a safe, stable, and permanent home for abused and neglected children. W. Va. Code § 49-1-105. In furtherance of this purpose, the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings (hereinafter "the Rules" or "Rule ____.") are intended to provide: 1) a fair and timely disposition of child abuse and neglect cases; 2) judicial oversight of case planning; 3) a coordinated decision-making process; 4) a reduction of unnecessary delays in case management; and 5) encouragement of involvement of all parties in the litigation as well as the involvement of all community agencies and resource personnel providing services to any party.

Child abuse and neglect proceedings are divided into five main stages:

1. Petition: The child abuse and neglect proceeding generally commences with the filing of a petition alleging abuse and neglect. An emergency removal of the child may precede the petition;

2. Preliminary hearing: The preliminary hearing is typically the first hearing held in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. The court will consider whether it should commit (or continue, if an emergency removal occurred) the child to the temporary custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources ("the Department") or some responsible person; and may consider, if requested, whether to grant a pre-adjudicatory improvement period for the parents or custodians;

3. Adjudicatory hearing: At the adjudicatory hearing the court determines whether the child was abused or neglected based upon the allegations in the petition. If abuse or neglect is found, the court may commit (or continue if an emergency removal occurred) the child to the temporary custody to the Department or a responsible person; and may consider a request for a post-adjudicatory improvement period for the parents or custodians;

See Special Procedures Section X. for a discussion of pre-petition proceedings relating to child abuse and neglect matters.

4. Disposition hearing: At the disposition hearing, the court determines the proper disposition of a child who has been adjudged abused and neglected. The court may find that any previous improvement period has been successful and dismiss the petition, the court may grant a request for a dispositional improvement period; or the court may terminate parental rights and begin implementing a permanency plan that does not involve reunification;

5. Permanency Hearing: The purpose of the permanency hearing is to determine the permanent placement and plan for the child; and

6. Permanent Placement Review: The court will continue to regularly monitor the child's progress with quarterly reviews until the child is permanently placed.

Child abuse and neglect cases have priority over all civil proceedings, except for domestic violence proceedings and trials already in progress. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(j). Upon the filing of a petition before the circuit court, a hearing must be docketed immediately. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601. Under no circumstances shall an abuse and neglect proceeding be delayed pending the initiation, investigation, prosecution, or resolution of any other related proceeding, including, but not limited to, criminal proceedings arising from the allegations of abuse or neglect. Rule 5.

With regard to the procedure for abuse and neglect cases, the West Virginia Supreme "has insisted that the directives of applicable rules and legislative enactments must be carefully identified, respected, and incorporated within our court system." In re Edward B., 558 S.E.2d 620, 631 (W. Va. 2001). Furthermore, "[t]he Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and the related statues detailing fair, prompt, and thorough procedures for child abuse and neglect cases are not mere general guidance; rather, they are stated in mandatory terms and vest carefully described and circumscribed discretion in our courts, intended to protect the due process rights of the parents as well as the rights of the innocent children." Id.

II. JURISDICTION

It is well settled that jurisdiction for abuse and neglect proceedings lies in the circuit courts. Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 496 S.E.2d 198 (W. Va. 1997). While a case is pending, the circuit court retains exclusive jurisdiction over the child's placement. Rule 6. The court also retains jurisdiction over subsequent requests for modification, including any changes in permanent placement or requests for visitation. The two circumstances in which a circuit court would not retain jurisdiction over subsequent placements of a child include the following: 1) the case is dismissed for failure to state a claim under Chapter 49; or 2) the child's legal and physical custody is returned to the child's cohabitating parents and the court had not entered an order regarding visitation or child support. In those circumstances, any future child custody, visitation or child support action may be brought in family court. Rule 6.

III. EMERGENCY CUSTODY

A. Pre-Petition Removal

If a child in the presence of a child protective services worker is in imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child (as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-201), and if the worker has probable cause to believe the child will suffer additional abuse or neglect or will be removed from the county before petition can be filed, the worker may take the child into his or her custody prior to filing a petition. W. Va. Code § 49-4-303. If this pre-petition action is taken, the worker must "forthwith" appear before a circuit judge or a juvenile referee (a magistrate appointed by the circuit court) and apply for an order ratifying the emergency custody.

The application should be made to the judge or referee in the county where custody was taken. If neither a judge nor a referee can be located, the worker may apply to a judge or referee in an adjoining county. The application must set forth facts sufficient to support a probable cause finding. In the event the emergency taking is ratified by a juvenile referee, the referee must obtain oral confirmation from the circuit court or an adjoining circuit court, which must then enter an order of confirmation on the next judicial day.

If the court or referee ratifies custody, the child may remain with the Department no longer than two judicial days unless a petition is filed and the court awards temporary custody as discussed below. W. Va. Code § 49-4-303.

B. Post-Petition Removal

Rule 16 establishes procedural protections that address circumstances when the Department, without a court order, takes physical custody of a child while a child abuse and neglect case is pending. Even if the Department has been previously granted legal custody of the child, it must immediately notify the court when it takes physical custody of (or removes) the child without a court order. In turn, the court must conduct a hearing within ten days to determine whether there is imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and whether there is no reasonably available alternative to removal of the child. Rule 16(d).

C. Required Findings for Removal Order

Any court order that authorizes the removal of the child from his or her home must include case-specific findings concerning the following:

1. There is reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger;

2. Continuation in the home is contrary to the welfare of the child;

3. Whether the Department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family or that an emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and

4. What efforts, if any, should be made to return the child to his or her home. Rule 16(e).

IV. FILING A PETITION

A. Petitioners

Either the Department or a reputable person may file a petition based upon a belief that a child is abused or neglected. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(a). The petition must be verified by a credible person who has knowledge of the facts. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601; Rule 17(a).

B. Co-Petitioners

Two or more parties, including the Department and a non-abusing parent, may consent to bring a petition as co-petitioners against an allegedly abusive and neglectful parent. Rule 17(a). Rule 25a(e) of the Rules for Domestic Violence Proceedings indicates that a petitioner in a domestic violence protective order proceeding may also appear as a co-petitioner in a child abuse and neglect case, as long as both the petitioner and the Department agree. Although Rule 25a(e) identifies a petitioner in a domestic violence proceeding as a possible co-petitioner, this rule provides that it should not be construed to require a petitioner in a domestic violence case to appear as a co-petitioner in a child abuse and neglect case. Similarly, Rule 25a(e) further provides that it should not be construed to prevent a petitioner in a domestic violence case from filing an abuse and neglect petition if the Department does not do so.

Similar to Rule 25a(e) of the Rules for Domestic Violence Proceedings, Rule 13(b) of the Rules for Minor Guardianship Proceedings provides that a petitioner in a minor guardianship case may be allowed to appear as a co-petitioner in an abuse and neglect case, if both the Department and the minor guardianship petitioner agree. However, the minor guardianship petitioner may, but is not required to, appear as a co-petitioner with the Department.

When co-petitioners bring a petition, each party shall indicate which of the allegations that he or she is verifying. When a co-petitioner is a parent, he or she shall be appointed counsel who is separate from the prosecuting attorney. Rule 17(a).

After an initial abuse and neglect petition is filed, the Department, a parent or other reputable person may move to be joined as a co-petitioner. Rule 17(a). If allegations of abuse and neglect arise against a co-petitioner while a case is pending, the court may amend the petition and realign the parties. Rule 19(c).

C. Venue

Either a reputable person or the Department may file an abuse and neglect petition in the county where the child normally resides. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(a); Rule 4a. If the Department is the petitioner, the petition may be filed where the abuse and/or neglect occurred or where the custodial respondent or other respondents reside. However, a party may not file petitions in more than one county based upon the same set of facts. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(a); Rule 4a.

D. Contents of the Petition

A child abuse and neglect case is formally commenced with the filing of a verified petition. Rule 17(a). The petition must contain the following:

1. Specific allegations of misconduct: The petition should allege how the misconduct comes within the statutory definition of abuse and/or neglect. Rule 18(a), (c); W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(b); see also W. Va. Code § 49-1-201 (definitions relating to child abuse and neglect). In addition to the statutory references, the petition should allege specific conduct, including the time and place of the misconduct or whether the person responsible for the care of the child is incapacitated. Rule 18(c); W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(b). The petition should also contain a description of any supportive services already provided by the State to remedy the circumstances. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(b); Rule 18(c);

2. Description of children: The petition should also contain a description of all the children in the home or temporary care of the offending parents or custodians, including children who are not alleged to be abused or neglected. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a); Rule 18(b). This information should include, the name, age, sex, and the current location of the children. The petition need not include the location if disclosing the location would endanger the children or seriously risk disruption of the current placement following an emergency removal;

3. The relief sought: The petition should state the relief sought, such as temporary custody (W. Va. Code § 49-4-601) and any disposition permitted by West Virginia Code § 49-4-604, including the termination of parental rights. Rule 18(d); and

4. Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA): The petition or attached affidavit should contain the information required by the UCCJEA. W. Va. Code § 48-20-209; Rule 18(e).

This information required by the UCCJEA includes the children's current residence, the children's residences for the last five years, and the names and current addresses for persons with whom the children have lived for the last five years. Additionally, the petition should include information, if known, about any court proceeding that concerns custody, visitation, any domestic violence proceedings affecting the children, termination of parental rights and adoption of the children. Further, the petition should identify any person, including any known address, who is not a party to the proceeding but has physical custody of the children or who claims legal rights to custody or visitation. W. Va. Code § 48-20-209(a). If the disclosure of any of this required information would jeopardize the safety of a party or a child, the court may seal the information in the court file upon the submission of an affidavit. W. Va. Code § 48-20-209(e).

The court must ensure that the facts in the petition are sufficiently specific; and the sufficiency of each petition should be judged individually. State v. Scritchfield, 280 S.E.2d 315 (W. Va. 1981) (holding that a petition is insufficient when it only alleges one fact: that the mother had been a mental patient from time to time). Mere conclusions alone are insufficient. One reason for the specificity requirement is to provide notice to the offending parents or custodians, thus, allowing them an opportunity to defend the factual allegations. See Moore v. Munchmeyer, 197 S.E.2d 648 (W. Va. 1973).

E. Amendments to Petition

The court may allow the petition to be amended at any time until the final adjudicatory hearing begins, provided that an adverse party is granted sufficient time to respond to the amendment. Rule 19(a). If the petition is amended after the conclusion of a preliminary hearing in which custody has been temporarily transferred to the Department or a responsible person, another preliminary hearing is not required. Rule 19(d). If new allegations of abuse and/or neglect arise after the final adjudicatory hearing, the allegations should be included in an amended petition, as opposed to filing another petition in a new case. When a petition is amended in this manner, the adjudicatory hearing must be re-opened for the purpose of hearing evidence on the new allegations. Rule 19(b).

F. Initial Order

The initial order entered upon the filing of a petition must address:

1. First Hearing Date

The court must set an initial hearing date when the petition is filed. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601; Rule 20. If the court orders a temporary placement at the time of the filing of the petition, a preliminary hearing must be initiated within ten days. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a); Rule 22. Even if a transfer of custody is not made at the time the petition is filed, the court may set a preliminary hearing if facts alleged in the petition indicate existing imminent danger. Rule 20; W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b). In any event, the court must give the respondents at least five days actual notice of the preliminary hearing. Rule 20; W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b). If a preliminary hearing is not held, the adjudicatory hearing should be set to commence within 30 days of the filing of the petition. Rule 25. The court may grant a continuance for a reasonable period of time upon a showing of good cause, provided that the reasons for finding good cause are stated in the order. Rule 7.

2. Appointment of Counsel

The initial order must include appointment of counsel for the child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f). The parents, legally established custodians or persons standing in loco parentis to the child also have a right to be represented by counsel in any child abuse and neglect proceeding. The order should provide, consistent with the statute, that the appointed representation will only continue after the first hearing if the represented party submits a financial affidavit showing an inability to pay for services of counsel. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

Counsel for other parties should only be appointed upon request and upon the filing of a qualifying financial affidavit. W.Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

In no circumstance shall a lawyer represent both the child and any of the parents or custodians. A lawyer may represent multiple parents or custodians only if the parties consent to the multiple representations after full disclosure and consultation by the lawyer regarding possible conflicts. The lawyer must also assure the court that his or her professional judgment will not be impaired during the representation of multiple clients. However, a parent who is a co-petitioner is entitled to his or her own attorney. One lawyer may represent multiple children in the same matter. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-4-601(a) and Rule 17, an individual may serve as a co-petitioner with the Department, provided that both parties consent. When a parent has been named as a co-petitioner with the Department, he or she is entitled to the appointment of his or her own counsel, separate from the prosecuting attorney. Rule 17(a); W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f).

Counsel appointed for any of the parties must complete at least eight hours of CLE training per each two-year reporting period on child abuse and neglect procedure and practice. Any attorney appointed to represent a child must first complete training on representing children that has been approved by the Supreme Court Administrative Office. If no attorney is available who has completed the required training, the court may appoint a competent attorney who has demonstrated knowledge of child welfare law. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(g).

3. Appointment of CASA

In the areas of the State where a Court-Appointed Special Advocate (CASA) Program is functioning, the court may appoint a CASA representative to advocate for the child. If a CASA representative is appointed, the court should provide him or her with a copy of the petition and the notice of the first hearing. Rule 20. The CASA representative shall by such appointment have access to information and court filings, receive notice of hearings and copies of orders, and be afforded the right to be heard. Rules 3(o) and 52.

4. Temporary Custody

The court may order the temporary transfer of custody to the Department or a responsible person based solely on the facts alleged in the petition. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602. The transfer of custody may only be ordered if the Court makes the following specific findings:

a. Imminent danger: The court must find that there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child (See W. Va. Code § 49-1-201); and

b. No reasonable alternatives: The court must also find that no reasonable alternatives to removal exist. Some reasonable alternatives that the court may consider are medical, psychological, psychiatric, family preservation, or homemaking services in the child's present custody setting.

When the court makes a determination granting temporary custody based on the petition, it must not allow placement of the child in the household of the alleged abusing person, unless there is a judicial order precluding the offending person from residing in or visiting the home. A preliminary hearing must be initiated within ten days of the continuation (see Preliminary Hearing Section below) or transfer of out-of-home custody. Rule 22. Even if the allegations of abuse or neglect do not pertain to some of the children in the home, the court should also remove those children if the court finds they are in imminent danger and there are no reasonable alternatives to removal. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a).

When the court orders the temporary change of custody of a child based on the facts alleged in the petition, the order must also contain findings:

a. That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interest of the child, and why; and

b. Whether or not the Department made reasonable efforts to prevent the placement, or that an emergency situation exists making such efforts unreasonable or impossible, or that reasonable efforts were not required due to certain aggravating circumstances specified by statute. See W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-105; 49-4-602(d).

The order may also contain a direction to the Department or any other person to become involved in the process in order to facilitate the reunification of the family. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(a).

5. Visitation While Case is Pending

If the court transfers custody of the children in the initial order, it may grant or deny visitation or other contact in a manner consistent with the child's best interest and well-being. The person requesting visitation or other contact, such as telephone or video calls, e-mail or other communication, shall inform the court of her or his relationship with the child and the amount of previous contact with the child. If the court orders supervised visitation, the court should consider the child's age, condition, and whether the surroundings are a safe, dignified and otherwise suitable place for visitation. When siblings are placed separately, visitation between siblings should continue and a plan for regular contact should be implemented, unless the court finds that the visitation and contact is not in the child's best interests. Rule 15.

In addition to visitation that is requested pursuant to Rule 15, the circuit court has jurisdiction to address requests for grandparent visitation if an abuse and neglect petition concerning the same child or children is pending. W. Va. Code §§ 48-10-401(c) and 402(d). Otherwise, petitions or motions for grandparent visitation fall within the family court's jurisdiction.

G. Answer

An adult respondent must file and serve a verified answer upon the petitioner and his or her counsel no later than ten days after being personally served with the petition. Rule 17(b). A respondent who is served by publication or other substituted service shall file his or her answer within the time allowed for such substituted service. Although a respondent is required to file an answer, the petition shall not be taken as confessed. Rule 17(a). It is not necessary, however, to continue a preliminary hearing when an answer has not been filed or served. Rule 17(b).

V. PRELIMINARY HEARING

A. When Held

If the court orders the child or children to be temporarily removed from parental custody at the time the petition is filed, a preliminary hearing must be initiated within ten days. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602; Rule 22(a). If a transfer of custody is not ordered at the time the petition is filed, the court may schedule a preliminary hearing if facts alleged in the petition indicate imminent danger to a child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b).

B. Notice

Notice of the preliminary hearing date, time, and place must be served upon on the following parties and persons entitled to notice and a right to be heard: known parents, any other custodian, any foster or preadoptive parent, any relative providing care for the child, the Department, and any CASA representative who has been appointed. Rules 3(o) and 20. Notice at least five days in advance of the hearing is required. Rule 20. The computation of the time periods shall be in accordance with Rule 6(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 7.

The respondents should be served in person if such service is readily obtained. If personal service is not reasonably obtainable, then a respondent may be served by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested directed to the last known address. In either case, service should include the notice of hearing and a copy of the petition. If the party cannot be served by personal service or certified mail, the party may be served by publication (Class II legal advertisement). W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(e).

C. Temporary Custody

In general, the court should consider at the preliminary hearing whether to order (or continue) a temporary transfer of custody. If the court finds that the child is in imminent danger at the preliminary hearing, it may order temporary custody of the child to the Department or to another responsible person. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b). At the conclusion of the preliminary hearing, the court must determine the following:

1. Whether there is reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger;

2. Whether continuation in the home is contrary to the welfare of the child, and the reasons for this determination;

3. (a) Whether the Department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and to prevent the removal of the child (and what efforts were made); or (b) Because an emergency situation existed, such efforts were unreasonable or impossible; or (c) That reasonable efforts were not required due to aggravating circumstances. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-105; 49-4-602(d);

4. Whether the Department made reasonable accommodations in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act to disabled parents to allow them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b); and

5. What efforts, if appropriate, should be made by the Department to facilitate the child's return to the home. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b); Rule 3(g). (See also Special Procedures Chapter 4.)

The court may transfer the temporary custody of the child for up to 60 days (or longer when an improvement period is granted). W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b).

D. Waiver or Stipulation of Preliminary Hearing

An adult respondent may waive his or her right to a preliminary hearing or stipulate to certain matters set forth in the petition, such as whether the child was in imminent danger. Before a court may accept such a waiver or stipulation, it must determine that the parties and persons entitled to notice and a right to be heard understand and voluntarily consent to the waiver or stipulation. Additionally, the court must conclude that the waiver or stipulation meets the purpose of the governing rules and statutes and is in the child's best interests. The court must resolve any objection to a waiver or stipulation raised by a party or a person entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard. The preliminary hearing order must include the waiver or any specific stipulations. Rule 22(c).

E. Other Matters

The court may order an improvement period consistent with West Virginia Code § 49-4-610(1) (pre-adjudicatory improvement period). The court may also require a party to pay child support. (See Special Procedures Chapter 4.) The court must require the parents to complete necessary financial forms to determine whether they are entitled to appointed counsel, the amount of any child support obligation, and Title IV-D and IV-E eligibility. Rule 17(c)(5). The circuit court may not transfer or remand the case or a portion of it to the family court for the entry of a support order. Syl. Pt. 3, DHHR v. Smith, 624 S.E.2d 917 (W. Va. 2005). Unless waived by the parties, the court shall make a transcript of the proceeding. The rules of evidence apply to all hearings in child abuse and neglect cases, including preliminary hearings. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k).

VI. MULTIDISCIPLINARY TREATMENT TEAMS

A. Convening MDTs

A multidisciplinary treatment team (MDT) must be convened within 30 days after the petition is filed. Rule 51; W. Va. Code § 49-4-405. Rule 51 refers to the court causing an MDT to be convened, and West Virginia Code § 49-4-405 refers to the Department convening an MDT. The practical way to interpret these two provisions is that the Department case manager should convene the MDT. However, the court should provide any necessary assistance or oversight to ensure that an MDT is convened. For example, the court could include the dates for MDT meetings in an order. In addition, any case manager for a child or family may obtain an order from the court to schedule a meeting and to direct attendance at a meeting. W. Va. Code § 49-4-403(b).

B. Multidisciplinary Treatment Team Members

The MDT shall include the following individuals:

1. The child or family's case manager in the Department;

2. The child's parents or guardians;

3. Any co-petitioner;

4. Any adult respondent;

5. The attorneys representing any of the parties;

6. The child, unless the team determines that the child's participation is inappropriate (Rule 8(d));

7. The child's counsel or guardian ad litem;

8. The prosecuting attorney, or his or her designee;

9. A member of a child advocacy center (If a child has been processed through one of the center's programs, a representative from the center shall be included; otherwise, a representative is included when appropriate);

10. An appropriate school official;

11. Any other agency, person or professional who may be helpful to the MDT's efforts, such as any CASA representative, a domestic violence service provider or any other service providers; and

12. Foster parents, preadoptive parents, or custodial relatives providing care for the child. Rules 3(o) and 51; W. Va. Code § 49-4-405.

If a party's parental rights have been terminated, that party and his or her counsel, unless otherwise ordered by the court, should not be given notice of any MDT meeting and do not have the right to participate in an MDT meeting. W. Va. Code § 49-4-405(b).

Members may participate by telephone or video conferencing. W. Va. Code § 49-4-403(b). Each team director must keep records of attendance and case discussions for each meeting. W. Va. Code § 49-4-407. The Department may designate a person, other than the case manager, to facilitate a treatment team meeting.

C. Use Immunity for Statements

To facilitate the development of case plans for children and families, the Legislature has provided use immunity for subsequent criminal prosecutions, with the exception of prosecutions for perjury or false swearing, if a respondent or co-petitioner admits any underlying allegations of abuse or neglect in a multidisciplinary treatment team meeting. W. Va. Code § 49-4-405(e). This statutory provision was designed to address the Supreme Court's observation that the immunity provided to adult respondents for court-ordered examinations under various statutes would not extend to statements made during MDT meetings. In re Daniel D., 562 S.E.2d 147, 159 (W. Va. 2002). Subsection (e) has, therefore, modified Daniel D. with regard to statements made during MDT meetings.

D. Purpose of Multidisciplinary Treatment Teams

The purpose of the MDT is to assess, plan, implement, and monitor a comprehensive, individualized service plan for children in abuse and neglect proceedings. W. Va. Code § 49-4-405. See also W. Va. Code § 49-1-207. The MDT will be involved throughout the circuit court proceedings until permanency is achieved for the child, and it should assist the court with quarterly status review hearings. W. Va. Code § 49-4-110. The duties of the multidisciplinary treatment team shall not be abrogated by an adoption review committee or other administrative process of the Department. Rule 51(c). MDT recommendations and reports are most often reviewed by the court at status conferences held during improvement periods, at disposition, and at permanent placement review conferences.

If the MDT provides the court with a recommended service plan prior to disposition (W. Va. Code § 49-4-403(b)), the court must review the service plan to determine if its implementation is in the child's best interests. If the court decides not to adopt the plan or the members cannot agree on a plan, it must hold a hearing within ten days of such determination to hear from the MDT regarding its rationale for a proposed plan or any objections. If the court does not accept the plan, it must make specific written findings as to why the MDT's recommended service plan was not adopted. W. Va. Code § 49-4-404. An MDT recommendation (and any resulting hearing under the circumstances just discussed) is not required for any temporary out-of-home placement in an emergency circumstance or for assessment purposes. W. Va. Code § 49-4-412. See also Overview Section X. Child and Family Case Plans.

VII. IMPROVEMENT PERIODS

A court may order an improvement period during the proceeding. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610. The purpose of an improvement period is to give a respondent the opportunity to rectify the circumstances that gave rise to the child abuse or neglect proceeding. Improvement periods may be custodial or non-custodial. However, if the child was removed from his or her home because of imminent danger, the child should remain in an out-of-home placement "until the circumstances which constitute the imminent danger have ceased to exist or the alleged abusing person has been precluded from residing in or visiting the home." Syllabus, in part, In the Interest of Renae Ebony W., 452 S.E.2d 737 (W. Va. 1994). See also Syl. Pt. 2, In the Interest of Betty J.W., 371 S.E.2d 326 (W. Va. 1988).

When any improvement period is granted, the burden of initiation and completion of all its terms rests with the respondent seeking the improvement period. The court may, however, direct the Department to pay expenses associated with the services provided if the respondent is unable to bear the costs. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(4). The respondent will generally be required to execute a release of all medical information, to permit access to such records by the Department and counsel. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(4). Finally, the Department is required to monitor the progress of the respondent during the improvement period, and report to the court any failures to comply. If such failure is substantiated, the court should forthwith terminate the improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(7).

Although the Court may grant different types of improvement periods and extensions as discussed below, any combination of improvement periods should not result in a child remaining in foster care more than 15 of the most recent 22 months. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(9). The reason for this limitation is to ensure compliance with federal guidelines established by the Adoption and Safe Families Act. However, a court may allow this time limit to be extended if it finds compelling circumstances by clear and convincing evidence that it is in the child's best interests to do so. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(9). See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-605.

A. Pre-adjudicatory Improvement Periods

At any time between the filing of the petition and an adjudication, the court may grant a respondent a pre-adjudicatory improvement period. The improvement period may only be granted after the respondent files a written motion requesting the improvement period and upon the demonstration by the respondent, by clear and convincing evidence, that he or she is likely to fully participate in the improvement period. Further, the court must set forth on the record the terms of the improvement period. The improvement period may last no longer than three months.

Any order granting an improvement period must provide, in addition to those items mentioned above:

1. That the Department submit a family case plan within 30 days; and

2. That a status conference be held within 60 days; or

3. That the Department submit a written progress report within 60 days, in which case a status conference must be held within 90 days. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-610(1); 49-4-110; Rule 23.

The MDT must attend the status conference and report as to progress and developments in the case. The court may also require or accept reports or statements from other persons. The court may, at any time prior to its completion, revoke the improvement period upon the motion of any party if the respondent has failed to comply with its terms or if the parties show an inability to remediate the circumstances that gave rise to the abuse and neglect. Rule 23; W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(7).

B. Post-adjudicatory Improvement Periods

The court may order an improvement period after a final adjudicatory hearing provided that the findings required for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period (see above) are made, and that the order contains the same provisions as those required for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period. Additionally, the court must find that the respondent has not previously been granted an improvement period, or that since the initial improvement period there has been a substantial change in circumstances that would render it likely that the respondent will participate in a further improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(2); Rule 37.

The post-adjudicatory improvement period may be for up to six months. An extension of up to three additional months may be granted by the court based upon findings that: the respondent has substantially complied with the improvement period; that continuation will not substantially impair the ability of the Department to permanently place the child; and that an extension is in the best interest of the child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(2) and (6).

During a post-adjudicatory improvement period, the Department may proceed with reasonable efforts to place the child for adoption or with a legal guardian or to find other permanent placement. Rule 37. The development of a concurrent plan is considered to be in a child's best interests. Syl. Pt. 5, In re Billy Joe M., 521 S.E.2d 173 (W. Va. 1999).

A hearing is to be held at the end of an improvement period, and it must be conducted no more than 30 days after the conclusion or termination of an improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8).

C. Disposition Improvement Periods

The court may grant an improvement period as a disposition. The required findings, order provisions, and time frames are identical to a post-adjudicatory improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(3). Within 30 days after the end of the improvement period, the court must conduct a hearing to determine the final disposition of the case. Rule 38; W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8).

D. Timing

The hearings scheduled in relation to an improvement period may only be continued for good cause. The party seeking the continuance must file a written motion and serve the motion on all parties. If the court grants such a continuance, the order must state the future date when the hearing will be held. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8)(A). The hearing held at the end of the improvement period should be held as close to the end of the period as possible. In no circumstances should the hearing at the end of the improvement period be held more than 30 days after the termination of the improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8)(B); Rule 38.

VIII. QUARTERLY STATUS REVIEW HEARINGS

West Virginia Code § 49-4-110[5] requires a circuit court to conduct status review conferences for each child in foster care on a quarterly basis commencing three months from the date a child is placed the Department's custody. The purpose of the hearing is to review the following issues: the safety of the child, whether continued placement is necessary and appropriate, compliance with the case plan, the progress towards remedying the conditions of abuse and neglect, and the likely date for reunification, placement in an adoptive home, in a legal guardianship, or other appropriate permanent placement. W. Va. Code § 49-4-110(a). Although the court is required to conduct these reviews, a court may conduct them in conjunction with other required hearings, such as a status review during an improvement period or a permanent placement review conference. W. Va. Code § 49-4-110(d); Rule 54. See also W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-610(1)-(3); Rules 23, 37 and 39.

This quarterly review requirement applies to both children and to "transitioning adults." Pertinent to abuse and neglect proceedings, the term "transitioning adult" means individuals who have reached the age of 18 but are under 21 years of age, and have entered into a contract with the Department to continue in an educational, training or treatment program which was initiated prior to the individual's 18th birthday. W. Va. Code § 49-1-202; Rule 54. Although the statute (W. Va. Code § 49-4-110(b)) refers to a transitioning adult who remains in foster care, the incorporating reference to the definition in Section 49-1-202 makes it clear that it applies to a transitioning adult who is in the legal and/or physical custody of the [5] Although this statute, West Virginia Code § 49-4-110, applies to children, juveniles or transitioning adults who are in the Department's custody as a result of an abuse and neglect case or a juvenile case, the discussion above focuses on abuse and neglect cases.

Department at the time he or she turns 18, and, for example, is participating in a residential treatment program or is attending school under an independent living arrangement. The court's duty to conduct such reviews will end when permanency is achieved or when the individual turns 21.

IX. ADJUDICATORY HEARING

The purpose of the adjudicatory hearing is to allow the parties to present evidence to support or refute the allegations of abuse and neglect.

All parties must be provided a meaningful opportunity to be heard. This includes the right to present and cross-examine witnesses. Unless waived, a transcript shall be made available to all the parties. The rules of evidence apply to final adjudicatory hearings. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(h) and (k). Foster parents, preadoptive parents, and relative caregivers shall also be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the court must determine whether the child is abused or neglected as defined by West Virginia Code § 49-1-201. If applicable, the court may find that a parent, guardian, or custodian of the child is a battered parent or is a non-abusing parent. W. Va. Code §§ 49-1-201; 49-4-601(i). The court's findings must be based on clear and convincing proof that the conditions supporting the petition existed at the time the petition was filed. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i); Rule 25. See also Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 102 S. Ct. 1388 (1982) (Due process requires clear and convincing evidence before termination of parental rights). After an adjudicatory hearing, a parent or custodian may appeal an adverse ruling. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k).

A. Hearing Time Frames

If the child was previously placed in the temporary custody of the Department or a responsible person without an improvement period having been awarded to a respondent, the hearing must be held within 30 days of the temporary custody order entered following the preliminary hearing. If a pre-adjudicatory improvement period was granted, the hearing must be held within 30 days after the end of the improvement period. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(j); Rule 25. If no temporary custody was ordered, the hearing must be held within 30 days after the filing of the petition. Rule 25.

B. Order

Upon conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, the court must enter an order of adjudication containing findings of fact and conclusions of law. The order must be entered within ten days of the conclusion of the hearing. Rule 27. Provided that the court found that child was an abused or neglected child, the order must require the Department to compile the child's case plan, which includes a permanency plan. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(a). The order should also include any provisions for an improvement period, if applicable.

C. Stipulated Adjudication and Uncontested Petitions

On those occasions where the respondent does not contest the petition or the parties agree upon a stipulated adjudication, the court may enter an adjudication order without taking evidence. Any stipulated or uncontested adjudication order must include:

1. Agreed-upon facts that support the court's involvement, including the respondent's conduct, condition, or problems; and

2. A statement of the respondent's problems to be addressed at the final disposition hearing. Rule 26(a).

The court must ensure that the parties fully understand the consequences and the content of the stipulated adjudication, and must find that the parties have voluntarily consented to the stipulation. The court must further find that the stipulation or uncontested adjudication is in the best interest of the child. Rule 26(b).

X. CHILD AND FAMILY CASE PLANS

A case plan includes comprehensive information about a child and his or her family and should also include plans for addressing the conditions of abuse and neglect. As a matter of primary importance, a case plan should address the safety of the child and the effects of abuse and neglect on the child. For example, a case plan should explain the terms of any safety plan if a child remains at home or should explain how an out-of-home placement assures a child's safety. It also must include a permanency plan and concurrent plan for the child. If the child requires services, such as therapy, a plan for providing the services should be included in the case plan. A case plan, if the Department is required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, must include a plan for addressing the adult respondents' role in the conditions of abuse and neglect. For that reason, a treatment plan for adult respondents must be included in a family case plan. In addition to these issues, a case plan should summarize important information about a child or his or her family. For example, it should include information about the child's health, any special needs and relatives who were contacted as potential placements. Finally, a case plan should also detail the care and development of a child. For example, it should address the child's education, any visitation plan for the child, any recommended evaluations and a transition plan, if the child is 16 years of age or older. Case plans, their contents and the times that they must be filed with the court are governed by state and federal law. 42 U.S.C. § 675; W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-604; 49-4-610; 49-4-408; Rules 23, 28 and 37.

The West Virginia Supreme Court and the Department have adopted a form for case plans that includes all information that must be included in a case plan. This form should be completed and submitted to the court at the times required by law. Rule 28.

Although the relevant rules and statutes refer to family and child case plans, these types of case plans are similar and, ideally, should contain much of the same information. The primary difference between a child and family case plan arises when reunification of the child is not the permanency plan for the child. If reunification is not the permanency plan for the child, the section of the plan that emphasizes treatments for and expectations of adult respondents will be omitted. As discussed below, the times for submission of child and family case plans are different.

A. Contents of Case Plans

1. General requirements. The following requirements should be included in all case plans.

a. A statement of necessary changes that will correct problems that led to Department intervention and a timetable for the achievement of the identified changes;

b. A description of the type of services that will assist the family in correcting the identified problems, along with an explanation of the appropriateness and availability of suggested services; and

c. The permanency plan and concurrent permanency plan for the child, which is designed to achieve timely permanency in the least restrictive setting available. Timelines for implementing the permanency plan must be included. If the permanency plan is another planned permanent living arrangement (APPLA), the Department must document the efforts it has made to place a child permanently with a parent, relative, guardianship or adoptive placement.

2. Placement of the child. Both child and family case plans should provide detailed information about the placement of the child. The following information must be incorporated into either type of plan:

a. The terms of a safety plan or services provided to the family if the child has remained in his or her home;

b. A description of any recommended out-of-home placement, which details the distance from a child's home and whether the placement is the least restrictive, i.e. most family-like one available;

c. A description of the efforts made by the Department to prevent placement or an explanation as to why such efforts were not viable;

d. A description of the efforts the Department made to keep the child enrolled in the school he or she attended at the time of removal when it selected a particular out-of-home placement for a child. Details should show that the Department coordinated with local educational agencies concerning this goal, including consultation with local school authorities concerning reasonable transportation;

e. The location of any siblings, the reason if the siblings are separated, and steps required to unite them if possible and plans for sibling visitation;

f. A description of friends and relatives who were contacted about providing a suitable and safe permanent placement for the child;

g. The steps taken to ensure that a foster family follows the "reasonable prudent parent standard," and has allowed the child regular opportunities to engage in age or developmentally appropriate activities; and

h. Any plan for child's visitation with the adult respondents and other contact with the child.

3. Treatment plan for adult respondents. A family case plan must include the following information that primarily addresses corrective actions for adult respondents:

a. A description of services for the child, parents, and foster parents or relative caregivers that will assist the family in remedying the identified problems, including an explanation of the appropriateness and availability of suggested services. Rule 28(a)(2);

b. The case plan should detail reasonable accommodations under the Americans with Disabilities Act provided to parents with disabilities that allows them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services;

c. A description of behavioral changes that must be evidenced by the respondents to correct the identified problems. Rule 28(a)(3); and

d. The ability of parents to contribute financially to placement.

The court should see that the case plan can be easily understood by the participants accountable under the plan. In addition, the court shall inform the participants of the consequences likely to follow from their failure to meet any of the goals listed in the case plan. The plan may be modified with court approval as appropriate during the course of its implementation. W. Va. Code § 49-4-408(a)-(b).

4. Information related to the care and education of the child. In addition to the treatment of adult respondents and considerations about placement, case plans should include specific information about a child's health and education. Of particular note, case plans should contain the following information:

a. Any special needs of the child and how they will be met in placement;

b. A description of the educational placement of the child, including a consideration of continued attendance at the school in which the child was enrolled before removal or efforts to ensure that educational records have been transferred to any new school;

5. Information related to transition into adulthood. For all children who have reached 16, case plans must include information about transition planning and services.

a. For a child who is age 16, services that will assist with transition into adulthood must be identified;

b. A child who is age 17 is entitled to immediate assistance with the development of a personalized transition plan. It must include specific options for housing, health insurance, education, local opportunities for mentors, continuing support services, work force support and employment services; and

c. A child who is age 17 and who also has special needs is entitled to an adult services worker on his or her MDT team. The MDT should coordinate with other transition planning teams, such as individualized education planning (IEP) teams.

6. When termination of parental rights is requested.

a. A description of the efforts made by the Department to prevent placement or an explanation as to why offering services was not a viable option;

b. A description of efforts made towards reunification or why these efforts should not be made; and

c. Any objections by any party to the case plan.

B. Participants in the Development of Case Plans

Although the Department has the primary responsibility for the preparation and filing of case plans, parents, their counsel, a child who is capable of expressing his or her preferences, the child's counsel, relative caregivers, foster parents and other multidisciplinary treatment team members should assist with the development and preparation of the case plan. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-405; 49-4-408; Rules 23, 28 and 37.

C. Filing of Case Plans

1. Family Case Plan: A family case plan must be filed with the court within 30 days after an improvement period is granted. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(1)(D), (2)(E) and (3)(E); Rules 23(a) and 37. It should be served on all parties and persons who are entitled to notice and a right to be heard.

2. Child Case Plan: A child's case plan must be provided to parties, their counsel and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard at least five judicial days before the disposition hearing. Rule 29. The time for the submission of a child case plan is sometimes confusing because a possible disposition is an improvement period. A practical way to avoid the duplication of efforts would be for the multidisciplinary treatment team to prepare a case plan that includes the components of a family case plan when it is anticipated that a dispositional improvement period will be granted. Alternatively, the adult respondents could waive the right to the submission of a case plan prior to disposition.

3. Modifications: Once a case plan has been filed, it is not necessary to file another copy of the case plan at each review hearing. Updated information may be filed with the court in the form of a court summary or progress report. The West Virginia Supreme Court and the Department have adopted a progress report which can summarize the status or progress of a case. A revised or modified case plan, however, should be filed with the court.

D. Objections to Case Plans

A party may object to the child's case plan at the disposition hearing. In each case, the court must enter an order:

1. Approving the plan;

2. Ordering compliance with all or part of the plan;

3. Modifying the plan in accordance with the evidence presented at the hearing; or

4. Rejecting the plan and ordering the Department to submit a revised plan within 30 days. If the court rejects the child's case plan, the court shall schedule another disposition hearing within 45 days. Rule 34.

XI. DISPOSITION HEARING

A. Timing

The court shall begin the disposition hearing within 45 days of the entry of the adjudicatory order if no post-adjudicatory improvement period has been granted, or within 30 days after the post-adjudicatory improvement period ends. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8).[6]

The parties may choose to have an accelerated disposition hearing. In order to proceed with an accelerated disposition hearing, the following requirements must be met: 1) the parties must agree to the accelerated hearing; 2) the child case plan must have been completed and provided to the court and the parties, unless the parties have waived the right to the filing of child's case plan before disposition; and 3) notice of the disposition hearing was either provided or was waived by the parties. Rule 32.

B. Disposition

At the disposition hearing, the court must give the parties an opportunity to be heard. The rules of evidence apply in the hearing, and the respondents shall be given the opportunity to present and cross-examine witnesses. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court must make findings of fact and conclusions of law on the record or in writing. According to West Virginia Code § 49-4-604(b)(1)-(6), the court must give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:

1. Dismiss the petition;

[6] It is anticipated that Rule 32, which addresses the time-frame for a disposition hearing, will be amended to reflect the general statutory requirement that any hearings at the end of an improvement period are to be held within 30 days of the termination of the improvement period. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(8). The anticipated amendment will make Rule 32 consistent with this statute, as well as with Rule 25, which governs the timing of adjudicatory hearings, and Rule 38, which governs the timing of final disposition hearings.

2. Dismiss the petition and refer the child, the abusing parent, and/or battered parent to a community agency for assistance;

3. Return the child to the home under the supervision of the Department;

4. Order terms of supervision;

5. Commit the child to the temporary custody of the Department, a licensed private welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court; or

6. Terminate parental rights with the option of placing the child in the sole permanent custody of a non-abusing parent, including a battered parent.

Alternatively, under appropriate circumstances, the court may grant a dispositional improvement period prior to making a final disposition in accordance with the earlier-discussed options. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(3). (See Section VII. C. above.)

C. Order

The court must enter an order within ten days of the conclusion of the hearing. The order must set forth findings of fact and conclusions of law. Rule 36(a). The court should include the following, if applicable, in the dispositional order:

1. The date and time for the permanency hearing, if scheduling would be appropriate;

2. The date and time for the first permanent placement review conference or review of an improvement period;

3. The terms of visitation;

4. Services provided to the child and the family;

5. Restraining orders controlling the conduct of any party that may frustrate the disposition order;

6. Corrective actions that any parties must take to alleviate problems;

7. Conditions regarding the placement of the child, including any special needs the child may have;

8. Steps to unite the child with siblings and/or steps to maintain contact between siblings; and

9. The terms and conditions of the child's case plan or family case plan. Rule 36(b), (c).

D. Improvement Period

The court may order an improvement period in lieu of making a final disposition at the dispositional hearing. An improvement period ordered at the dispositional hearing may not exceed six months, with a 3-month extension being permissible upon findings of substantial compliance; continuation will not significantly impair achievement of permanent placement; and that the extension is in the child's best interest. If the court orders the improvement period, it should hold a final disposition hearing within 30 days after the improvement period ends. W. Va. Code § 49-4-610. If the court finds that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected, the court may not order an improvement period. Syl. Pt. 3, In re Darla B., 331 S.E.2d 868 (W. Va. 1985).

E. Temporary Custody

The court may order as a disposition that the child be committed to the temporary custody of the Department, a private child welfare agency, or a responsible person. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(5). When ordering this type of disposition, the court may not, however, delay the achievement of permanency for a period that exceeds the 12-month standard set by Rule 43 except in extraordinary circumstances. See Syl. Pt. 6, In re Cecil T., 717 S.E.2d 873 (W. Va. 2011).

If the court orders temporary custody, and this is the first removal or a subsequent removal after an attempted reunification, it must include the following in its order:

1. Continuation in the home is contrary to the welfare of the child, and the reasons why;

2. Whether the Department made reasonable efforts to prevent the placement, and what those reasonable efforts were, or that an emergency situation existed making efforts unreasonable or impossible, or that such reasonable efforts were not required due to aggravating circumstances. (See also Special Procedures Chapter 4.);

3. Whether the Department has provided reasonable accommodations, as required by the Americans with Disabilities Act, to parents with disabilities so that they have meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services;

4. The circumstances under which the temporary custody shall continue, and in examining these circumstances, the court should consider whether the child should:

a. Be continued in foster care for a specified period;

b. Be considered for adoption;

c. Be considered for legal guardianship;

d. Be considered for permanent placement with a fit and willing relative; or

e. Be placed in another permanent living arrangement if there are compelling reasons not to follow one of the above options;

5. An order for financial support, if appropriate, from the parents if the child is transferred to the custody of the Department; and

6. An order requiring services for the child.

F. Uncontested Termination of Parental Rights

1. Uncontested Termination

A natural parent may, in some circumstances, fail to contest the termination of his or her parental rights. If a parent is present at a disposition hearing but does not contest the termination of his or her parental rights, the court should determine whether the parent understands the consequences of the termination of parental rights, whether the parent is aware of less drastic alternatives to termination, and whether the parent has been informed of the right to a hearing and to representation. Rule 35(a)(1).

If a parent fails to appear at a termination hearing, the petitioner must make a prima facie showing that there is a legal basis for terminating parental rights. In addition, the court must determine whether the parents were properly notified of the hearing. Rule 35(a)(2).

2. Relinquishments

The statute governing relinquishments, West Virginia Code § 49-4-607, indicates that a parent must relinquish his or her parental rights in writing. Similarly, Rule 35(a)(3) or (4) also refers to relinquishing parental rights in writing. The West Virginia

Supreme Court has recognized, however, that a parent may orally relinquish parental rights under Rule 35(a)(1), if he or she is present in court. In re Tessla M., 566 S.E.2d 221 (W. Va. 2002). Although an oral relinquishment in court is permissible, it is best practice to require a parent to sign a written relinquishment.

If a parent is present and has signed or signs a relinquishment during a disposition hearing, the court must determine whether the parent understands the consequences of relinquishing his or her parental rights. The court should determine whether the parent understands the possibility of less drastic alternatives, whether the parent was informed of the right to a disposition hearing and the right to counsel at a dispositional hearing. Rule 35(a)(3). In addition, the court must determine whether the parent was subject to either fraud or duress when he or she signed the relinquishment. W. Va. Code § 49-4-607.

If a parent has signed a relinquishment but is not present at the disposition hearing, the court must determine whether the document complies with statutory requirements, i.e. whether the document has been acknowledged and whether circumstances in which the parent signed the relinquishment were free from fraud and duress. Rule 35(a)(4); W. Va. Code § 49-4-607. The court must also determine whether the parent was both thoroughly advised and understood the consequences of signing a relinquishment. Further, the court must determine whether the parent was made aware of the possibility of less drastic alternatives, the right to a disposition hearing and the right to counsel at a disposition hearing. Rule 35(a)(4).

In some circumstances, the Department or other party may object to a parent's voluntary relinquishment of his or her parental rights. The common reason for such an objection is that the parent would not be subject to a mandatory child abuse and neglect petition under West Virginia Code § 49-4-605(a) for a later born child. However, the West Virginia Supreme Court has established that the circuit court has the discretion to accept a voluntary relinquishment or to reject it and proceed with a hearing on the issue of involuntary termination. Syl. Pt. 4, In re James G., 566 S.E.2d 226 (W. Va. 2002).

3. Relinquishments as Evidence of Abuse and Neglect

At times, a parent may opt to voluntarily relinquish his or her parental rights before a court has conducted or completed an adjudicatory or dispositional hearing. In those circumstances, a court may treat the relinquishment as the evidentiary basis for a finding of abuse and neglect. The court is not required to hear other evidence. W. Va. Code § 49-4-607. This particular provision of West Virginia Code § 49-4-607 is a codification of Syllabus Point 4 of In re Marley M., 745 S.E.2d 572 (W. Va. 2013), which allows a court to find that a child was abused or neglected based solely upon a relinquishment. As explained in Marley M., a parent's silence or failure to contest allegations by the submission of a voluntary relinquishment may serve as the evidentiary basis for a finding of abuse or neglect, and no further evidence would need to be presented to the court.

4. Subsequent Challenges to a Relinquishment

After a parent has signed a relinquishment and it has been accepted by the court, a parent may subsequently challenge a relinquishment based upon a showing of fraud or duress. W. Va. Code § 49-4-607. A court may conduct a hearing to determine whether the circumstances were, in fact, free from fraud or duress. Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Rose L. v. Pancake, 544 S.E.2d 403 (W. Va. 2001). Whether the court conducts such a hearing is within its sound discretion. In re Cesar L., 654 S.E.2d 373 (W. Va. 2007).

As explained by Justice Davis in her concurring opinion in Rose L., a parent who attempts to challenge a relinquishment faces an extremely high threshold. Rose L., 544 S.E.2d at 408. As a starting point, Justice Davis observed that duress "means a condition that exists when a natural parent is induced by the unlawful or unconscionable act of another to consent to the adoption of his or her child. Mere 'duress of circumstance' does not constitute duress[.]" Rose L., 544 S.E.2d at 408 (citing Syl. Pt. 2, Wooten v. Wallace, 351 S.E.2d 72 (W. Va. 1986)). In addition, she noted that the elements of fraud include the following:

> 1) that the act claimed to be fraudulent was the act of the defendant or induced by him; (2) that it was material and false; that plaintiff relied on it and was justified under the circumstances in relying upon it; and (3) that he was damaged because he relied on it. Rose L., 544 S.E.2d at 408 (citing Syl. Pt. 1, Lengyel v. Lint, 280 S.E.2d 66 (W. Va. 1981)).

Finally, Justice Davis aptly pointed out that: "Importantly, the inquiry does not end even if a parent satisfies that burden. Ultimately, lower courts must always return to the polar star principle: the best interests of the child." Rose L., 544 S.E.2d at 408. A court must, therefore, consider a child's best interests when it determines whether to set aside a relinquishment, even when the parent has shown that fraud or duress was used to obtain the parent's agreement to relinquish parental rights.

G. Contested Termination of Parental Rights

The court may determine at the dispositional hearing that parental or custodial rights should be terminated. To support such a determination, the court must find that there is "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future" and that the welfare of the child necessitates termination of the parental or custodial rights. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6). The statute provides that there is "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect and abuse can be substantially corrected" when the abusing adult has demonstrated an inability to solve the problems leading to the abuse or neglect on their own or with help. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(c). This code section provides examples of circumstances that support this determination:

> 1. The abusing adult has an addiction to alcohol or controlled substances that seriously impairs parenting skills and the abusing adult has not responded to the recommended treatment;
> 2. The abusing adult has willfully refused to participate in the development of a reasonable family case plan;
> 3. The abusing adult has not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to prevent the abuse and neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of the conditions of abuse or neglect, such that the conditions that threatened the welfare of the child have not diminished in a substantial way;
> 4. The abusing parent has abandoned the child;
> 5. The abusing adult has repeatedly seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, or has engaged in sexual abuse such that the degree of family stress and potential for further abuse are so great that the use of resources to resolve or mitigate the family problems has been precluded;
> 6. The battered parent's parenting skills have been seriously impaired and said person has refused or is presently unable to cooperate in the development of a reasonable treatment plan or has not adequately responded to or followed through with a recommended treatment plan.

Of course, this list is not exhaustive, and there are other circumstances that can lead the court to find that termination of parental rights is necessary. Furthermore, the court should generally consider the following factors when deciding whether parental rights should be terminated:

1. The child's need for continuity of caretakers;

2. The amount of time needed to integrate the child into a stable, permanent home; and

3. Other factors relating to the child's safety, well-being, and permanency the court considers necessary and proper. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)(A).

If the child is age 14 or older or is of an age of discretion as determined by the court, the child's wishes shall be considered. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)(C). See In the Interest of Jessica G., 697 S.E.2d 53 (W. Va. 2010). If the court terminates parental rights, the court may commit the child to the sole custody of the non-abusing parent, including a battered parent, or to the permanent custody of the Department. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6).

If the termination involves the first removal of the child from the home (or follows an extended improvement period in the home) the contrary-to-welfare and reasonable efforts to prevent placement findings must be made. If removal occurred earlier, reasonable efforts findings regarding finalizing the permanency plan are likely due. (See Special Procedures Chapter 4.)

H. Mandatory Petitions for Termination of Parental Rights

In some circumstances established by statute, the Department is required to seek the termination of parental rights. W. Va. Code § 49-4-605. These circumstances include when a child has been in foster care for 15 of the most recent 22 months. The beginning date for entry into foster care is defined as the earlier of the following dates: 1) the date of the first judicial finding that the child was subject to abuse or neglect; or 2) 60 days after the child was removed from his or her home. The second circumstance is when a court determines that a child has been abandoned, tortured, sexually abused or chronically abused. Further, the Department is required to seek termination if a court finds that a parent has committed any of the following acts: 1) the murder or voluntary manslaughter of another of his or her children, another child in the household or the other parent of his or her children; 2) has attempted or conspired to commit such a murder or voluntary manslaughter of another of his or her children or the other parent of his or her children; 3) has been an accessory before the fact or after the fact of either of these crimes; or 4) has committed unlawful or malicious wounding resulting in serious bodily injury to the child, another of his or her children, another child in the household or to the other parent of his or her children. Finally, the Department is required to seek the termination of parental rights if the parent's parental rights to another child have been involuntarily terminated. W. Va. Code § 49-4-605(a).

Despite these statutory mandates, subsection (b) of West Virginia Code § 49-4-605 establishes situations in which the Department is relieved of its obligation to request the termination of parental rights. First, the Department may opt not to request termination if the child has been placed with a relative by a court order. Secondly, the Department is not required to seek termination of parental rights if the child's case plan documents a compelling reason not to do so that includes but is not limited to: the child's age and preference regarding termination, the child's placement in the Department's custody as a result of a juvenile proceeding (Part VII of Article 4 of Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code) or the child's best interests. Finally, the Department does not have to seek termination if it was required to provide reasonable efforts to reunify a family, but has not done so.

The statutory mandate is placed upon the Department to request termination of parental rights. The court, however, has the option to determine whether parental rights should, in fact, be terminated. With regard to a similar, but earlier version of the statute, the West Virginia Supreme Court held that: "Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the Legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present." Syl. Pt. 2, in part, In the Matter of Glen B., Jr., 518 S.E.2d 863 (W. Va. 1999). In cases of prior involuntary terminations, the Court held that: "prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s)." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, Glen B., Jr., 518 S.E.2d 863.

The relevant statute is now W. Va. Code 49-4-605(a).

XII. PERMANENT PLACEMENT

A. Jurisdiction

The presiding circuit court has exclusive authority or jurisdiction to determine the permanent placement of a particular child. Rule 36(e). The permanent placement of a child shall not be disrupted or delayed by an administrative process or other determination by the Department, such as an adoption review committee or a grievance procedure. Id.; W. Va. Code § 49-4-606(a).

In addition to an initial determination of permanency, the circuit court retains jurisdiction over any subsequent request for the modification of the permanent placement of a child. See Rules 6, 45(b) and 46. The two circumstances in which a circuit court would not retain jurisdiction over subsequent placements includes: 1) a case in which an abuse and neglect petition is dismissed for failure to state a claim under Chapter 49; or 2) the court returns a child to the custody of his or her cohabiting parents and does not establish terms of visitation or child support. Rule 6. In the cases of a disruption or dissolution of a permanent placement, the circuit court of origin will retain jurisdiction to determine any subsequent placement for a child. Rule 45. Similarly, the circuit court retains jurisdiction over any proceeding involving the restoration of parental rights. W. Va. Code § 49-4-606(c).

B. Permanency Hearing

The purpose of the permanency hearing is to determine the appropriate plan for achieving permanent placement for a child or a "transitioning adult."[7] Rule 36a; W. Va. Code § 49-4-110(c). Included in such a determination is a finding as to whether the child shall remain in the Department's custody, the efforts that must be made to place a child in a permanent home, and the likely date for achieving permanent placement. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-608(b); 49-4-110(a).

The scheduling of a permanency hearing is dependent upon the court's finding as to whether the Department is required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family. Rule 36a; W. Va. Code § 49-4-608. If the court finds that the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, then the permanency hearing must be held within 30 days of the order that makes this finding. Such a finding arises in cases involving aggravated circumstances.[8] W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(7); see also W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(d). Rather than hold a separate hearing, the court can satisfy the permanency hearing requirement (i.e. determine the permanent plan for the child) at the same hearing in which the determination is made that reasonable efforts to reunify the family are not required. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(h)(2).

Alternatively, absent a finding that the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, then a court is required by West Virginia Code § 49-4-608(b) to conduct a permanency hearing within 12 months after the Department has obtained physical custody of a child if the child has not been placed in one of the following types of placements: an adoptive home, with a natural parent, a legal guardianship, or permanent placement with a fit and willing relative. One issue to note is that under this state statute, the time period is one to two months shorter than the federal standard that specifies when a permanency hearing shall be conducted. Rule 36a mirrors the federal time standard for a permanency hearing, and [7] A "transitioning adult" is defined as an individual who has reached 18 years of age but is under 21 years of age, was adjudicated as an abused or neglected child and has entered into a contract with the Department to continue in an educational, training or treatment program which was initiated prior to the 18th birthday. W. Va. Code § 49-1-202.

both the federal statute and this rule provide that a permanency hearing must be conducted within 12 months of a child's entry into foster care. See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-110 (Requiring a permanency hearing within 12 months of the entry into foster care.) The date the "child entered foster care" is defined as the earlier of: (i) the date of the first judicial finding that the child has been subject to abuse or neglect; or (ii) 60 days after the date on which the child was removed from the home. Rule 36a(b); 42 U.S.C. § 675(5)(F). If a court conducts a permanency hearing according to the 12-month period after receiving physical custody of a child as required by West Virginia Code § 49-4-608(b), then the court would necessarily be in compliance with the slightly longer federal standard.

Another question arises with regard to the requirement of a permanency hearing. The language of the state statute refers to the placement of a child in an "adoptive" home as a situation in which a permanency hearing would no longer be required. Under a literal reading of the statute, it would seem to obviate the need for a permanency hearing if a child has been placed in an adoptive home but an adoption had not yet been finalized.[9] However, the other permanency options identified in the statute connote that the placement has been finalized by its reference to placement with a natural parent, in a legal guardianship, or permanently placing a child with a fit and willing relative. In addition, the definition of "permanent placement" with regard to adoption indicates that permanency has been achieved "when the child has been adopted," thereby indicating that the adoption has been finalized. Rule 3(n). Further, permanent placement reviews are required until permanency is actually achieved. See Rules 39-42. A permanency hearing should, therefore, be conducted if a child has been placed in an adoptive home, but the adoption has not been finalized and it has been 12 months since the Department obtained custody. In other words, to meet the apparent intent of the state statute (and comply with the federal time standard) the phrase placement "in an adoptive home" in West Virginia Code § 49-4-608 should be read to negate the permanency hearing requirement only when an adoption has been finalized.

One other issue is implicated by West Virginia Code § 49-4-608(b) because it does not refer to the federally recognized permanency option of another planned permanent living arrangement (APPLA). The federal Adoption and Safe Families Act (ASFA) recognizes APPLA as a permanency option in limited circumstances. Although not mentioned in the above-discussed state statute, the state rules also recognize APPLA as a permanent placement. Rule 3(n)(3). It is the least preferred permanency outcome, but APPLA can be utilized when there is a demonstrated compelling reason why none of the four preferred permanency options are practical or in the child's best interest.[10] Therefore, even though not mentioned in West Virginia Code § 49-4-608(b), permanent placement through an APPLA plan (with a truly stable and supported outcome), would obviate the requirement for a permanency hearing since permanency has been achieved.

A court is required to conduct additional permanency hearings every 12 months after the initial permanency hearing for each child who remains in the legal or physical custody of the Department. This requirement will continue until a child is placed in one of the following permanent placements: in an adoptive home; returned to a natural parent, placed in a legal guardianship or permanently placed with a fit and willing relative. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-608; 49-4-110. As discussed above, achieving permanency through an APPLA would similarly negate the need for any additional permanency hearings.

When a permanency hearing is scheduled, notice must be given to the following persons: the child's attorney; the child, if he or she is 12 years or older; the child's parents (and counsel); the child's guardians; the child's foster parents; any preadoptive parent or any custodial relative of the child; any other person entitled to notice and the right to be heard; and any other person, in the court's discretion, directed to receive notice. W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(b). Any parent whose rights have been terminated (and their counsel) would not be given notice. Rule 39(c) (final sentence). See also Rule 3(o). If a child is age 12 or older, he or she has the right to attend a permanency hearing. This right may be waived by the child's attorney at the child's request or if the child is younger than 12 years of age and would suffer emotional harm. W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(b).

C. Permanent Placement Review

The court, with the assistance of the MDT, must continue to monitor implementation of the permanency plan. After a permanency hearing order has been entered, a permanent placement review hearing must be held at least once every three months until permanency is achieved. Counsel for the parties (except terminated parents) and interested persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard should be given at least 15 days notice of the review. The review must actually be held and may not be conducted merely with the entry of an agreed order. Rule 39; W. Va. Code § 49-4-110.

[10] The ASFA regulations, at 45 C.F.R. § 1356.219(h), provide three examples of compelling reasons that could support a determination that an APPLA is an appropriate permanency outcome:

(i) an older teen who specifically requests that emancipation be established as his/her permanency plan;

(ii) the case of a parent and child who have a significant bond but the parent is unable to care for the child because of an emotional or physical disability and the child's foster parents have committed to raising him/her to the age of majority and facilitate visitation with the disabled parent; or

(iii) the Tribe has identified an APPLA for the child.

The best practice is to schedule the next review at the conclusion of the current review hearing.

At least ten days before each review, the MDT and the Department must provide the court and parties with a progress report describing efforts to implement permanent placement. Additionally, the court may accept progress reports or statements from other persons, including the parties, service providers, and CASA. Rule 40.

During the review, to the extent applicable to the permanency plan, the court should consider:

1. The extent to which problems that have given rise to the child abuse or neglect proceedings have been remedied;

2. Services or assistance provided to the family since the last hearing, and services and review conferences needed in the future;

3. Reasonable accommodations provided in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act to parents with disabilities to allow them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services;

4. Compliance by the adult respondent and the Department with the case plan and previous court orders and recommendations;

5. Any recommended changes in court orders;

6. The extent to which the adult respondent contributes financially to the placement of the child, and his or her ability to contribute;

7. The appropriateness of the current placement of the child, including its distance from the child's home and whether it is it is the most family-like setting;

8. The appropriateness of the current educational placement and the Department's efforts to keep the child enrolled in the same school he or she was attending at the time of removal, including the Department's coordination with local education agencies about arrangements for reasonable travel or enrollment of the child in a new school;

9. A summary of visitation and any recommended changes;

10. Whether the child's special needs were or were not met while in placement, as well as whether the child has had regular opportunities to engage in age or developmentally appropriate normal childhood activities;

11. The location of siblings and the steps being taken to unite them and/or maintain regular contact with them;

12. For children aged 14 or older, the specific services aimed at transitioning the child into adulthood;

13. For children aged 17 or over, a personalized transition plan for a child that includes specific options on housing, health insurance, education, local opportunities for mentors, continuing support services, workforce support and employment services;

14. If a child is aged 17 or over and has special needs, he or she is entitled to the appointment of an adult services worker to the MDT, who, in turn, will coordinate with other transition teams, such as IEP teams; and

15. If the child's permanent placement is APPLA, the efforts that were made to place a child permanently with a parent, relative, guardianship or adoptive placement; the child's preferred permanency option, and steps taken by any foster family to allow the child the opportunity to engage in normal childhood activities. Rule 41(a).

During the permanent placement review conferences, the MDT should make recommendations regarding future placement issues for the child. Some of the information that should accompany various recommendations proposed at the review conference is:

1. If a return to the home is recommended: (a) steps necessary to make return possible and to minimize the disruptive effects of a return; (b) the dangers that may face the child after a return; and (c) reunification services necessary to minimize danger to the child;

2. If return to the home is not recommended: (a) whether adoption is recommended; if so, (b) the steps needed to effectuate the termination of parental rights; and (c) the time needed to achieve such measures;

3. If neither return nor placement for adoption is recommended: (a) a discussion of guardianship or permanent custody with a responsible individual; and (b) if recommended, a discussion of (i) the rights and responsibilities of the biological parents and the custodial parents or guardians, and (ii) a timetable for establishing legal guardianship or permanent custody;

4. If continued foster care with specific foster parents is recommended: an explanation of why foster care continues to be appropriate for the child. Additional topics that should be addressed are a discussion of permanently placing the child in foster care, including, (i) a proposed timetable, (ii) terms of the foster care agreement, (iii) the continuing rights and responsibilities of the biological parents, and an explanation of why foster care continues to be appropriate for a child;

5. If placement in a group home or institution is recommended: (a) why treatment outside a family setting is necessary, including expert diagnoses and recommendations; (b) why less restrictive, family settings are not practical; and (c) why placement with specially trained foster parents is not practical;

6. If emancipation or independent living is recommended for children over 16 years old: (a) why foster care is no longer appropriate; (b) the skills needed by the child to prepare for adulthood; and (c) a description of the ongoing support and services to be provided by the department;

7. A concurrent alternative permanency plan; and

8. Any other matter relevant to implement the child's permanency plan. Rule 41(a)(14)(A)-(H).

D. Preferences for Permanency Plans

Note: West Virginia Code § 49-4-111, discussed below, applies to foster care as well as adoptive placements. The discussion in this paragraph is, however, limited to adoptive placements.

When establishing a permanency plan, West Virginia Code § 49-4-111 sets forth a preference for placing a child in an adoptive home with his or her siblings. See also Syl. Pt. 4, In re Shanee Carol B., 550 S.E.2d 636 (W. Va. 2001). When a child becomes eligible for adoption and his or her siblings have already been placed in an adoptive home, the Department is required to notify the adoptive parents that the child is eligible for adoption. W. Va. Code § 49-4-111(d). The purpose of providing notice is to determine whether the adoptive parents want to seek custody of the child. If the adoptive parents are willing to do so, the Department must determine whether the adoptive parents are fit and whether the placement of the child is in the best interests of the child and his or her siblings. W. Va. Code § 49-4-111(d). To maintain the separation of siblings, the Department must show, by clear and convincing evidence, that the siblings should remain separated. Syl. Pt. 4, Shanee Carol B., supra.

Similar to sibling placements, West Virginia Code § 49-4-114(a)(3) establishes a preference for placing a child for adoption with his or her grandparents if parental rights have been terminated. See also Syl. Pts. 4 and 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 617 S.E.2d 801 (W. Va. 2005). This code section presumptively establishes that it is in the child's best interests to be adopted by his or her grandparents. However, the preference is not absolute. If a court determines that placement with grandparents is not in a child's best interests, it is not required to choose the grandparents over another placement that serves a child's best interest. Napoleon S. v. Walker, supra; In re Elizabeth F., 696 S.E.2d 296 (W. Va. 2010); In re Hunter H., 715 S.E.2d 397 (W. Va. 2011); In re Aaron H., 735 S.E.2d 274 (W. Va. 2012).

Federal law requires the Department to consider the placement of a child with relatives as opposed to non-relatives. 42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(19). However, similar to the sibling and grandparent preferences established by West Virginia statutes, this preference is not absolute and does not override another placement that is in a child's best interests. See Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 706 S.E.2d 381 (W. Va. 2011).

E. Permanent Placement Review Orders

The court shall enter an order within ten days of the review conference, stating whether permanent placement has been achieved. Rule 42(a). The court shall include findings of fact and conclusions of law supporting its determination. If the court finds that permanent placement has not been achieved, the court shall include in the order the issues discussed at the review conference, including the following:

1. Changes in the child's case plan the court deems necessary to achieve permanent placement, with accompanying findings of fact;

2. Changes in visitation and other parental involvement;

3. Changes in services to be provided to the parties and the child;

4. Changes to the educational plan for the child to further the child's educational stability;

5. Steps to assist a child aged 14 or older to develop a transition plan;

6. Restraining orders controlling any conduct of parties likely to frustrate the order;

7. Additional action to be taken by parties involved in order to achieve permanent placement;

8. If the identified permanency plan is APPLA, the court should ask the child about his or her desired permanent placement. The court should then determine whether APPLA is the best permanency plan for the child and should also review the Department's efforts to place the child permanently with a parent, relative, guardian or an adoptive placement. The court must find a compelling reason why it is not in the child's best interests to place the child in one of the other types of permanency placements;

9. Findings as to whether the Department has made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan in a timely manner. (See Special Procedures Chapter 4, Section VI.); and

10. A date and time for the next permanent placement review conference. Rule 42(c).

If the court issues an order that permanent placement has been achieved, the case may be dismissed from the docket. Rule 42(b).

F. Timeframe for Achievement of Permanency

Permanent placement is to be achieved within 12 months of the final disposition order unless there are extraordinary reasons to justify the delay. If permanent placement is delayed beyond 12 months post-disposition, the court should place specific findings of the extraordinary reasons justifying the delay on the record. Rule 43.

XIII. POST-TERMINATION VISITATION

Note: Rule 15 applies to visitation both prior to and subsequent to termination of parental rights. This section, however, is limited to post-termination visitation. For a discussion of pre-termination visitation during a case, see Overview Section IV. F.

Rule 15 establishes general procedures for visitation between a child and any person, including parents, with whom the child has developed a close emotional bond. When the court terminates parental rights, the effect of the ruling is to prohibit visitation between the child and the parent and between the child and grandparents. Post-termination visitation should only be allowed if the court finds that the child consents and post-termination is in the child's best interests. When considering post-termination visitation, the court must determine whether it would interfere with the child's case plan and whether it is in the child's best interests.

The Supreme Court has held that a court may grant post-termination visitation between a parent and child based upon a child's right to continued association. Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 460 S.E.2d 692 (W. Va. 1995);

In re Katie S., 479 S.E.2d 589 (W. Va. 1996). A request for post-termination visitation should be brought by a written motion that has been properly noticed for hearing. Syl. Pt. 5, In re Marley M., 745 S.E.2d 572 (W. Va. 2013). Although a court should consider evidence and arguments of counsel with regard to the factors set forth in Syllabus Point 5 of Christina L., a court may forego such a process if the circumstances make the consideration of further evidence "manifestly unnecessary." Id.

When determining whether to grant post-termination visitation, the trial court must consider whether there is a close emotional bond between the parent and child. The Court has recognized that it takes several years to develop a close emotional bond and, therefore, post-termination visitation would normally be granted only in cases involving older children. See In re Alyssa W., 619 S.E.2d 220 (W. Va. 2005). If the child is of appropriate age and maturity, the court should also consider the child's wishes. As stated above, in all cases where it is permitted, the court must find that the visitation would be in the child's best interests and must not interfere with the child's case plan. Syl. Pt. 5, Christina L., 460 S.E.2d 692; Rule 15.

If a child is not placed with his or her siblings, the court may provide for continued visitation or contact between siblings. Syl. Pt. 4, James M. v. Maynard, 408 S.E.2d 400 (W. Va. 1991). Rule 15 establishes a presumption for continued contact between siblings by requiring that such visitation and contact shall continue unless it is not in the best interests of the child and his or her siblings.

Questions of grandparent visitation are subject to Rule 15 and the Grandparent Visitation Act, codified at West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-101, et seq. As an initial matter, motions or petitions for grandparent visitation must be addressed in circuit court while an abuse and neglect case is pending. W. Va. Code § 48-10-402(d).

Once a circuit court has terminated the parental rights of the parent through whom the grandparents are related to the child, Rule 15 establishes that the termination order has the presumptive effect of prohibiting contact and visitation between the child and the grandparents. However, the circuit court may allow visitation if the child consents, and it is in the child's best interests to have continued contact. The court should consider the factors set forth in West Virginia Code § 48-10-502 when determining whether to grant grandparent visitation. See In re Samantha S., 667 S.E.2d 573 (W. Va. 2008); In re Grandparent Visitation of Cathy L.R.M. v. Mark Brent R., 617 S.E.2d 866 (W. Va. 2005).

Post-adoption visitation between a child and his or her grandparents is initially dependent on whether the adoptive parents are stepparents, grandparents or other relatives of the child. If a child is adopted by a non-relative, then the Grandparent Visitation Act does not allow for grandparent visitation, and a prior grandparent visitation order is automatically vacated. Syl. Pt. 3, In re Hunter H., 744 S.E.2d 228 (W. Va. 2013). Additionally, a grandparent may not file a grandparent visitation petition when a child has been adopted by a non-relative. If a relative has adopted a child, then post-adoption visitation may be granted after the court considers the factors set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-501 and -502. However, the West Virginia Supreme Court, however, has recognized that "significant weight" must be accorded to the preference of the adoptive parents. Cathy L.R.M., 617 S.E.2d at 875.

Consistent with other types of visitation, the Supreme Court has recognized that a court may award continued visitation to foster parents if a child has developed a close relationship with them. Syl. Pt. 11, In re Jonathan G., 482 S.E.2d 893 (W. Va. 1996); In the Matter of Zachary William R., 509 S.E.2d 897 (W. Va. 1998). To award visitation between a child and foster parents, the circuit court must find that continued contact is in the child's best interests.

XIV. MODIFICATION OR SUPPLEMENTATION OF COURT ORDERS

A. Modification of Orders

Modification or supplementation of court orders is governed by Rule 46, which addresses the modification of any abuse and neglect court order, including a disposition order, and West Virginia Code § 49-4-606 which addresses the modification of disposition orders only. The following persons may file a motion to modify or supplement a court order: a child; a child's parents (whose parental rights have not been terminated); a child's custodian; or the Department. To modify a court order, a party must show, by clear and convincing evidence, that the proposed modification is in the child's best interests. Rule 46, however, excludes child support orders from this evidentiary requirement and allows such orders to be modified upon a showing of a substantial change in circumstances as provided by the statute governing the modification of child support orders, West Virginia Code § 48-11-105.

B. Modification of Dispositional Orders

For sound policy reasons, the modification of a dispositional order is more restrictive than other types of orders. Rule 46; W. Va. Code § 49-4-606. In a parenthetical, Rule 46 provides that only parents whose rights have not been terminated may move to modify or supplement an order in an abuse and neglect case. In addition to the parenthetical in Rule 46, the Supreme Court has recognized that a person whose parental rights have been terminated no longer has the status of parent to the child and lacks standing to request modification of an order after his or her parental rights have been terminated. Syl. Pts. 4 and 5, In re Cesar L., 654 S.E.2d 373 (W. Va. 2007).

It is, therefore, settled that a person whose parental rights have been terminated does not have standing to move to modify a dispositional order.

Not only are there limits on who has standing to request relief, there are also limits as to when such relief may be requested. A court may not modify a dispositional order that terminated parental rights after a child has been adopted.

When a party seeks to modify a dispositional order, he or she should make a motion to the court. In turn, the court should conduct a hearing on the motion. W. Va. Code § 49-4-606(a).

C. Dissolution or Disruption of Permanent Placement

If a case has been dismissed and a child is removed from a permanent placement or the custodians of the child relinquish their rights to the child, the matter should be brought to the attention of the circuit court of origin, the Department and the child's counsel. The Department is required to convene a multidisciplinary treatment team meeting within 30 days of notice of the disruption. In turn, the circuit court of origin is required to schedule a permanency hearing within 60 days of the report. Notice should be given to any appropriate parties and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. Rule 45; W. Va. Code § 49-4-606(b).

D. Restoration of Parental Rights

West Virginia Code § 49-4-606 has established a procedure for the restoration of parental or custodial rights or the placement of a child with a person whose parental or custodial rights have been terminated, provided that a child has not been adopted. W. Va. Code § 49-4-606(c). However, the only parties that may request this relief are the Department or the child. A person whose parental or custodial rights have been terminated is not authorized to request the restoration of his or her custodial or parental rights. As a basis for awarding this relief, the court must find, by clear and convincing evidence, that there has been a material change of circumstances and that the placement of the child with such an individual and/or the restoration of the individual's custodial or parental rights is in the child's best interests.

XV. APPEALS AND PETITIONS FOR EXTRAORDINARY RELIEF

A. Procedure for Appeals

After any adverse judgment at the adjudicatory hearing, the court shall inquire whether the parents or custodians want to appeal the decision. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k). The court should transcribe the response by the parents; however, a negative response will not constitute a waiver of the right to appeal if the parents later change their mind. The appeal may pertain to the court's determination of child abuse or neglect at the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k). In this regard, an appeal after an adverse finding at adjudication is a permissible interlocutory appeal.

A party may also appeal a ruling after a final disposition hearing. For example, the Department may appeal an order that provides for reunification. As another example, a parent may appeal the termination of his or her parental rights. Dependent upon his or her position regarding the child's best interests, a guardian ad litem could appeal an order that provides for termination of parental rights or provides for reunification.

As with other appeals, a party appealing a judgment must file a notice of appeal within 30 days of the judgment. See W. Va. R.A.P. 11; W. Va. RPCANP 49. A motion to modify a judgment does not operate to toll the time for initiating an appeal.

Effective January 1, 2016, attorneys for respondents in abuse and neglect cases are subject to Rule 10(c), a rule that governs an attorney's responsibilities when an attorney lacks a good faith belief that an appeal is warranted. In those situations, the attorney is required to discuss the relative merits of an appeal with the client and must file an appeal if the client insists. In Rule 10(c)(10)(b), it is acknowledged that an attorney may be compelled ethically to dissociate himself or herself from the contentions of a brief. In those circumstances, the attorney must preface the brief with a statement indicating that brief has been filed according to Rule 10(c)(10)(b). When an attorney is ethically compelled to disassociate himself or herself from assignments of error that the client wants to be raised, the attorney must file a motion requesting leave for the client to file a pro se brief that includes the errors that the client wants to address on appeal. Counsel should not, however, argue against the client's interests.

Since abuse and neglect cases are civil cases, the appellant is required to pay the $200 filing fee when the notice of appeal is presented to the Supreme Court, unless the party is entitled to a waiver of the fee. W. Va. Code § 59-1-13. In those circumstances, the party should file the appointed counsel affidavit that was approved in circuit court or present an affidavit for approval by the West Virginia Supreme Court when the notice of appeal is filed.

In addition to information that must be included in all cases on appeal, the notice of appeal requires a party in an abuse and neglect case to provide particular information to the Supreme Court. As an attachment to a notice of appeal, a petitioner must include a list of the names, ages and parents' names of all minor children, a brief description of the current status of parental rights of each parent at the time of the filing of the notice of appeal, a description of the proposed permanent placement of each child, and the name of each guardian ad litem appointed in the case. See W. Va. R.A.P. Appendix A.

Appeals in abuse and neglect cases are accelerated under a shorter-than-normal period for perfecting the appeal. The petitioner's brief and required appendices must be filed with the Supreme Court Clerk within 60 days of the judgment. W. Va. R.A.P. 11; W. Va. RPCANP 49. The circuit court from which the appeal is taken may, however, extend the time period for perfecting the appeal for an additional period that does not exceed two months. To extend this time period, the notice of appeal and required attachments must have been timely filed. The party requesting such an extension should file a written motion with the circuit court and must also file a copy with the Supreme Court Clerk. Any order ruling on the motion must be provided to the Supreme Court Clerk. W. Va. R.A.P. 11(f); W. Va. RPCANP 49. Alternatively, a party may request an extension of the time period by filing a written motion with the Supreme Court Clerk. When requesting an extension from the Supreme Court, a party must follow the procedure established by Rule 29 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure. W. Va. R.A.P. 11(f); W. Va. RPCANP 49. The same 60-day timeframe applies to motions seeking to extend the appeal period filed with the Supreme Court.

Subsection (f) of Rule 11 allows a party to request leave to file a late appeal from the Supreme Court even if a party did not file a notice of appeal. A party, however, may only obtain this relief in extraordinary circumstances. This relief may only be obtained in the West Virginia Supreme Court, not the circuit court.

Under Rule 11(i), the parties are required to include a section in their brief that indicates the current status of the children, the permanency plan for the children, and the current status of parental rights.

According to Rule 11(j) if oral argument is scheduled, the parties are required to provide a written statement that provides any changes or updates to any circumstances set forth in the brief no less than one week before oral argument or within such other time specified in the Court's order. As explained in the Clerk's Notes, the requirement to update the Court on any change of circumstances addressed in the briefs has been placed in a separate subsection in order to highlight the importance of this requirement.

B. Appellate Duties of Guardian Ad Litem

Guardians ad litem are extremely important to the appellate process and are required to take an active role in any appeal. Even when a guardian ad litem did not initiate the appeal, he or she is required to file a responsive brief. The brief may be a summary response in appropriate cases.

W. Va. R.A.P. 11(h). A guardian ad litem must also appear at any oral argument scheduled in the case, unless the Court specifically orders otherwise. In addition, the Supreme Court, has, in case law, repeatedly emphasized the importance of the role of guardians ad litem in the appellate process. See Syl. Pt. 3, Matter of Scottie D., 406 S.E.2d 214 (W. Va. 1991); Syl. Pts. 4 & 5, In re Jeffrey R. L., 435 S.E.2d 162 (W. Va. 1993); State v. Michael M., 504 S.E.2d 177, n. 11 (W. Va. 1998); Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 706 S.E.2d 381, n. 4 (W. Va. 2011).

The West Virginia Supreme Court has squarely addressed the importance of a guardian ad litem's role in the appellate process. In a 2015 case, the Court entered two successive orders, each with a rule to show cause, to require a guardian ad litem to show why she should not be held in contempt for failing to file response briefs. In re A.N., Nos. 15-0182 and 15-0208 (W. Va. Supreme Court, September 30, 2015) (memorandum decision). Ultimately, the Court found the guardian ad litem in contempt for failing to comply with the scheduling orders, referred the matter to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel and directed that the attorney would not be eligible for guardian ad litem and other court appointments until the disciplinary action would be concluded. See Chapter 5, Section VIII for a complete discussion of case law addressing a guardian ad litem's appellate duties.

C. Stays

The filing of an appeal does not automatically stay the proceedings or orders of the circuit court in abuse and neglect cases. Rule 50 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings indicates that a party, upon a showing of good cause, may properly seek a stay of a judgment in an abuse and neglect case in the circuit court. Alternatively, a party may seek a stay from the West Virginia Supreme Court pursuant to Rule 28 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure. Under Rule 28, however, a stay must first be sought in the circuit court. If the stay is denied in circuit court or the applicant believes the relief afforded is insufficient, the applicant can then pursue a stay with the Supreme Court. W. Va. R.A.P. 28(b).

When a party requests a stay from the Supreme Court, he or she must file a written motion requesting relief. The motion must provide the reasons assigned by the circuit court for denying the stay or other relief sought. W. Va. R.A.P. 28(b). The motion should also explain the reasons for a stay, address the effect of a stay on the circuit court's ability to plan for a child, and address the effect of the stay on the child's best interests. W. Va. RPCANP 50. Although Rule 50 does not expressly require a party to file a written motion when seeking a stay in circuit court, it certainly is best practice to do so. Further, a party who seeks a stay in circuit court should base such a motion on the same issues that must be addressed in the Supreme Court: the reasons for the stay, the court's ability to plan for the child if a stay is entered, and the child's best interests.

D. Transcripts

West Virginia Code § 49-4-601(k) provides that a transcript must be furnished to indigent persons without cost. (See also W. Va. Code § 51-7-8). Section IX. 5. of the Manual for Official Court Reporters of the West Virginia Judiciary (Administrative Office of the Supreme Court of Appeals), promulgated October 30, 1984, amended December 13, 2010 ("Official Court Reporter Manual"), provides: "Transcripts of child abuse and neglect proceedings will be paid only if requested under the guidelines of an indigent criminal appeal." Accordingly, the Supreme Court Administrative Director's Office will pay transcription fees for preparation of an original and one copy of a transcript requested by an indigent party in an abuse and neglect case for purposes of appeal to the Supreme Court when the requirements are met.

Effective January 1, 2016, petitioners in abuse and neglect cases will need to submit transcripts when the Court will be reviewing disputed evidentiary or testimonial issues. Before the effective date of the amendments to Rule 11, parties would submit briefs without transcripts in abuse and neglect appeals. Parties to an abuse and neglect case are subject to Rule 9 which governs transcript requests.

When a petitioner is requesting transcripts, the petitioner must complete the Appellate Transcript Request Form and attach it to the notice of appeal. The petitioner must provide a copy of the Appellate Transcript Request form and required attachments to each court reporter that transcribed a hearing for which a transcript is sought. The scheduling order issued by the Supreme Court will indicate whether a transcript will be prepared, the extent of any transcript and the due date for it. W. Va. R.A.P. 11(d). To obtain a transcript without cost, a party must provide proof of indigency by submitting an affidavit of indigency or attaching the order appointing counsel to the transcript request form. See W. Va. R.A.P. 9(b) and R.A.P. Appendix A – Appellate Transcript Request Form.

E. Petitions for Extraordinary Writs

In addition to seeking appellate relief; a party to an abuse and neglect case may seek relief from the West Virginia Supreme Court by filing a petition for an extraordinary writ. For example, the West Virginia Supreme Court has recognized that a writ of prohibition may be used to challenge improvement periods that are of a greater duration than allowed by statute. Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 470 S.E.2d 205 (W. Va. 1996). In another circumstance, the extraordinary writ process was used by the DHHR to challenge a circuit court order requiring the agency to reunify a child with his parents, although the West Virginia Supreme Court declined the relief sought in this particular case. State ex rel. DHHR v. Fox, 624 S.E.2d 834 (W. Va. 2005). As a third example, a petition for a writ of mandamus was granted that required the DHHR to pay for therapy for an abused or neglected child, but only at the Medicaid rate. State ex rel. Aaron M. v. DHHR, 571 S.E.2d 142 (W. Va. 2001). A final example is State ex rel. WVDHHR v. Yoder, 703 S.E.2d 292 (W. Va. 2010). In this case, the Supreme Court granted the writ of prohibition sought by the DHHR and the guardian ad litem, preventing the return of the child to the mother under a dispositional improvement period.

As is true for any type of case, a petition for extraordinary relief should not be used as a substitute for an appeal. See Syl. Pt. 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 75 S.E.2d 370 (W. Va. 1953). When considering whether to file a petition for writ of prohibition, the well-recognized factors warranting such relief should be weighed. Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 483 S.E2d 12 (W. Va. 1996). In situations involving the possible filing of a petition for writ of mandamus, the three necessary elements should be present: 1) a clear legal right of the petitioner to the relief sought; 2) a legal duty of the respondent to do the thing sought to be compelled; and 3) the absence of another adequate remedy. State ex rel. DHHR ex rel. Chastity D. v. Hill, 532 S.E.2d 358 (W. Va. 2000).

It should also be noted that the West Virginia Supreme Court has recognized, in dicta, that a former foster parent could seek an extraordinary remedy, such as a writ of mandamus or a habeas corpus. In re Michael Ray T., 525 S.E.2d 315 (W. Va. 1999). In this case, the former foster parents of three children sought to intervene in the children's case after the children had been removed from their care. Holding that intervention could be allowed for current foster parents but not for former foster parents, the Court noted that former foster parents were not devoid of a remedy. Rather, the Court noted that they could seek relief by filing a petition for an extraordinary writ.

Rule 16 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure governs the procedure for filing petitions for extraordinary writs in any case, and it contains no specialized procedures for abuse and neglect cases. As a matter of common sense, however, a party who seeks extraordinary relief with regard to an abuse and neglect case should, if appropriate, include information concerning the current status of the minor children, plans for permanent placement, and the current status of parental rights. See W. Va. R.A.P. 11(i). If the case is scheduled for oral argument, the parties should inform the Court of any change of circumstances addressed in the briefs within one week of the oral argument or at any other time established by the Court. W. Va. R.A.P. 11(j).

I. PRINCIPAL ABUSE AND NEGLECT DEFINITIONS

West Virginia Code § 49-1-201 sets forth comprehensive definitions that pertain to all child abuse and neglect proceedings under Chapter 49 of the Code.

A. Abuse

The definition of "abuse" or an "abused child" includes knowing and intentional injuries, as well as situations in which a parent knowingly allows another person to injure a child. The types of injuries include physical injuries, as well as emotional and mental injuries. Abuse may also include sexual abuse, sexual exploitation or the sale or attempted sale of a child. It may further include domestic violence as defined by West Virginia Code § 48-27-202 and injuries inflicted as a result of excessive corporal punishment. W. Va. Code § 49-1-201.

One particular definition – when a parent knowingly allows another person to inflict physical, mental or emotional injury upon the child – has been the subject of significant litigation. This type of abuse occurs when a parent does not physically abuse a child but knowingly fails to take protective action in the face of abuse by another person. Syl. Pt. 2, In the Matter of Scottie D., 406 S.E.2d 214 (W. Va. 1991). This type of abuse also occurs when a parent or guardian, knowing that the abuse occurred, takes no action to identify the abuser. Syl. Pt. 8, W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 475 S.E.2d 865 (W. Va. 1996). These cases typically involve medical evidence that contradicts the parent's or custodian's explanations about the child's injuries.

This type of abuse is commonly referred to as "failure to protect," and a parent is often referred to as a "non-protecting parent." These common terms are, however, misnomers because this type of abuse does not occur because a child was subject to abuse and a parent simply did not prevent the abuse. Rather, the parent must know of the abuse and allow it by either failing to take any protective action or by aiding or protecting the abuser.

As noted previously, the definition of an "abused child" includes acts that would constitute domestic violence under West Virginia Code § 48-27-202 in the definition of child abuse. W. Va. Code § 49-1-201. The statute also includes a definition for a "battered parent" as one who has not "condoned the abuse and neglect and has not been able to stop the abuse or neglect of the child or children due to being the victim of domestic violence . . .. " W.Va. Code § 49-1-201. This provision recognizes that a victim of domestic violence may, dependent upon the facts of the case, not be considered to have knowingly allowed an abuser to inflict a physical, mental or emotional injury upon a child. The statute, therefore, makes a distinction between the commonly misused term of "failure to protect" from the statutory definition of abuse which occurs only when a parent knowingly allows abuse against a child.

Providing guidance about this definition of child abuse, the Supreme Court has held that the termination of a "non-protecting" parent's rights for this type of abuse is "usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In the Interest of Betty J.W., 371 S.E.2d 326 (W. Va. 1988). In Betty J.W., the circuit court terminated a father's parental rights after he sexually abused his seventeen-year-old daughter and terminated the mother's rights for failure to protect. The Supreme Court, however, reversed the termination of the mother's rights because the mother, a victim of domestic violence, reported the sexual abuse as soon as she could get away from her husband. The Supreme Court also noted that the mother had interceded when the father had attempted to sexually assault his daughter. In turn, the father beat the mother and threatened her with a knife. Based upon these facts, the Supreme Court concluded that the mother did not "knowingly" allow the abuse.

B. Neglect

A child is neglected when his or her physical or mental health is threatened by a refusal, failure or inability of the parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education.

However, the failure or inability of the parent, guardian or custodian must not arise primarily from the adult's lack of financial means. A child is also subject to neglect if the child's parent or custodian has disappeared or is absent, and as a result, the child is without food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision. W. Va. Code § 49-1-201.

C. Imminent Danger

The definition of imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child involves emergency situations that threaten the welfare or life of the child. Imminent danger is present if there is reasonable cause to believe that a child in the home has been sexually abused or exploited. It may also include non-accidental trauma. Additionally, imminent danger may involve a combination of physical signs and other signs that indicate a pattern of abuse and that may be medically diagnosed as battered child syndrome. Further, it includes circumstances involving nutritional deprivation, inadequate treatment of serious illness or disease, substantial emotional injury inflicted by a parent, guardian or custodian or the sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian. Finally, imminent danger encompasses situations in which substance abuse by a parent, guardian or custodian impairs that person's parenting skills to the extent that there is an imminent risk to the child's health or safety. W. Va. Code § 49-1-201.

II. RESPONSIBLE AGENCIES, OFFICERS AND PERSONS

A brief explanation of the statutory duties of the Department of Health and Human Services with regard to child welfare follows. Additionally, a brief description of duties and educational obligations for persons who work with children and families is also included.

A. Cooperation with United States Department of Health and Human Services

The West Virginia DHHR is the designated state agency that is required to cooperate with the United States Department of Health and Human Services for the purposes of extending and improving child welfare services, complying with applicable federal regulations and receiving and extending federal funds for child welfare services. W. Va. Code § 49-1-106(b).

B. Department of Health and Human Resources: Responsibilities for Protection and Care of Children

West Virginia Code §§ 49-2-101, et seq. sets forth the responsibilities of the Department for the care of abused and neglected children who are committed to its care for custody or guardianship. Care may be provided through: 1) foster homes; 2) licensed child welfare agencies; and 3) state institutions. West Virginia Code § 49-2-101 specifies the Department's responsibilities for child custody and care upon voluntary parental or guardian placement, from courts exercising juvenile jurisdiction and from law-enforcement officers in emergency situations. As part of its duties related to child abuse and neglect, West Virginia Code § 49-2-813 requires the Department to maintain a statewide child abuse and neglect statistical index of all substantiated allegations of child abuse or neglect.

In addition to its responsibilities for the care of children who are placed in its custody, the Department also has the duty to provide services to children and families in order to prevent unnecessary placements. See Part II, Article 2 of Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code. Consistent with this duty, the Department is required to provide services designed to preserve the family in cases where the removal of child is considered. However, such services are not required when a child is in imminent danger of serious bodily or emotional injury. W. Va. Code § 49-2-202.

Not only does the Department have the duty to avoid the unnecessary removal of children from their home, the Department also has the duty to facilitate the placement of children in permanent homes when they cannot be reunified with their family. Consistent with this duty, the Department is required to seek the termination of parental rights in specified instances. W. Va. Code § 49-4-605. In addition, the Department is required to make reasonable efforts to achieve timely permanency for children subject to child abuse and neglect proceedings. W. Va. Code § 49-4-608; Rule 36a. As part of its duty to achieve permanency for children, the Department is authorized to enter into contracts for subsidized adoptions and legal guardianships. W. Va. Code § 49-4-112.

C. Duties of Department: Licensing for Child Welfare Agencies

The Legislature has specified the responsibilities of the Department for the licensing, approving and registering of child care facilities and child welfare agencies in the State. W. Va. Code §§ 49-2-101, et seq. Applicable State regulations include Title 78, Series 2-- "Child Placing Agencies Licensure," and Title 78, Series 3-- "Minimum Licensing Requirements for Residential Childcare and Treatment Facilities for Children and Transitioning Adults in West Virginia."

D. Duties of Prosecuting Attorneys

Every prosecuting attorney has the following duties with regard to the abuse and neglect of children: 1) fully and promptly cooperate with persons seeking relief in suspected instances, including co-petitioners; 2) promptly prepare applications and petitions for relief; and 3) investigate reported cases for possible criminal activity and report to the grand jury at least annually in this regard. W. Va. Code § 49-4-502. The prosecuting attorney shall provide legal services to the Department. W. Va. Code § 49-4-501.

Any disputes that arise between a prosecuting attorney and the Department regarding proposed action that is believed to place a child at imminent risk are subject to the mediation provisions set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-4-501. As recognized by the West Virginia Supreme Court, the Department is the client of the prosecuting attorney in a county, and the relationship between the Department and a county prosecutor is a pure attorney-client relationship. See Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 490 S.E.2d 642 (W. Va. 1997); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Ashton M., 723 S.E.2d 409 (W. Va. 2012). In addition, every prosecuting attorney has the duty to establish a multidisciplinary investigative team for their county, which is responsible for coordinating and cooperating in the investigation of all civil and criminal allegations of abuse and neglect. W. Va. Code § 49-4-402. See also W. Va. Code § 7-4-5.

E. Department of Health and Human Resources: Multidisciplinary Treatment Teams

The Department is responsible for establishing a multidisciplinary treatment team process in every county (or in contiguous counties), which shall be responsible for addressing, planning and implementing comprehensive, individualized service plans for children who are victims of abuse and neglect. W. Va. Code § 49-4-403. See Overview Section VI. Multidisciplinary Treatment Teams for a complete explanation of multidisciplinary treatment teams in child abuse and neglect cases.

F. Duties of Child Protective Services

Under West Virginia Code § 49-2-802, the Department shall establish or designate a Child Protective Services Office for every county. The local office shall be responsible for: 1) investigating all reports of child abuse or neglect pursuant to the time standards and investigatory procedures specified in this statute; 2) providing, directing or coordinating appropriate and timely delivery of services to any child suspected or known to be abused or neglected (and services to the child's family); and, 3) initiating appropriate legal proceedings. (See also West Virginia Code § 49-4-303(2) relating to emergency custody by child protective service workers.)

G. Mandatory Reporting of Suspected Abuse or Neglect

Certain types of persons are established as mandatory reporters of child abuse or neglect. West Virginia Code § 49-2-803(a) requires medical, dental and mental health professionals, school personnel, social workers, childcare workers, clergy, law-enforcement officers, humane officers, and judicial officers to report any suspected child abuse or neglect. In addition, personnel (whether volunteer or not) of an entity that provides organized activities for children are identified as mandatory reporters. Further, commercial film or photographic print processors have been designated as mandatory reporters. If a person is a mandatory reporter and he or she is also a staff member or volunteer of an organization that provides organized activities for children, he or she is also required to notify the person in charge of the entity of the suspected abuse or neglect. In turn, the person in charge of the entity may supplement the report or make an additional report. The Department has been required to implement a procedure to inform these mandatory reporters whether an investigation of the suspected abuse or neglect has been initiated and when an investigation has been completed. W. Va. Code § 49-2-804.

Persons who are identified as mandatory reporters have the statutorily established duty to report information to the Department when they have reasonable cause to suspect child abuse or neglect or if they observe conditions that are likely to result in abuse and neglect to a child. The person should report the suspected abuse and neglect immediately, but no later than 48 hours after observing or receiving the applicable information. If the reporter believes that the child has suffered serious physical abuse or sexual abuse or sexual assault, he or she should also report the matter to the State Police and any other law-enforcement agency with jurisdiction. W. Va. Code § 49-2-803(a).

In addition to abuse or neglect of a child, suspected sexual assault or sexual abuse of a child triggers heightened reporting duties. W. Va. § 49-2-803(b). As an initial matter, the duty to report applies to any person over age 18. According to subsection (b), a person is subject to the duty to report any sexual abuse or sexual assault of a child if he or she either receives a disclosure from a credible witness or observes the sexual assault or abuse of the child. The report must be made no later than 48 hours after obtaining the information, and it must be made to the DHHR and the State Police or any law enforcement agency who has jurisdiction to investigate the allegations. A person who is under a duty to report sexual abuse or sexual assault of a child may delay making a report if the person has a good faith belief that reporting the allegations to law enforcement would expose the reporter, the subject child, the reporter's children or other children in the subject child's household to an increased threat of serious bodily injury. In these circumstances, the reporter must take steps to remove themselves or the affected children from the threat of additional harm and must report the matter to law enforcement as soon as practicable after the harm has been reduced. Once a law enforcement agency receives this report, the agency is required to report the matter to the Department. W. Va. Code § 49-2-803(b).

School teachers and other school personnel are also under a heightened duty to report suspected sexual abuse of a child. W. Va. Code § 49-2-803(c). This duty arises when a teacher or other personnel receives an objectively credible disclosure from a witness, or if he or she personally observes sexual contact, sexual intercourse or sexual intrusion of a child on school premises, school buses or on other transportation used in furtherance of a school purpose. School personnel are required to report the matter within 24 hours to law enforcement. They are relieved of the duty to report the matter if they inform a principal, assistant principal or other similar person in charge. In turn, the principal, assistant principal or other school official is required to report the matter to law enforcement within 24 hours.

Although the reporting requirement is fairly stringent, the first proviso in the statute indicates that a teacher or other school official is not required to report consensual sexual contact, intercourse or intrusion occurring between students if the conduct would not otherwise constitute any of the following crimes: first degree sexual assault (§ 61-8B-3); third degree sexual assault (§ 61-8B-5); first degree sexual abuse (§ 61-8B-7); and third degree sexual abuse (§ 61-8B-9).[11] A school official must, therefore, report incidents occurring between students if the actions could constitute any of those specified Article 8B offenses. Sections four (second degree sexual assault) and eight (second degree sexual abuse) were excluded from the list of identified offenses in the proviso, presumably because the offenses involve victims who by virtue of being physically helpless, mentally incapacitated or mentally defective are incapable of consent. In other words, a school teacher or other school official would not be relieved of the duty to report sexual contact, sexual assault or sexual abuse between students if one of the students could be considered physically helpless, mentally incapacitated or mentally defective. W. Va. Code § 49-2-803(c).

As noted in subsection (e), the reporting requirements apply to personnel in public or private schools. In addition, the reporting requirements apply to conduct that may occur between students or between a student and a school teacher or other personnel. When a law enforcement agency receives this type of report, it, in turn, must inform the affected student's parents, guardians or custodians within 24 hours.

H. Education and Training Obligations

Various statutory provisions mandate specific education or training for those persons most involved with prevention and intervention in situations of child abuse and neglect. West Virginia Code § 18-5-15c (County boards of education to provide pupils, parents and school personnel with training programs in prevention of child abuse and neglect); West Virginia Code § 48-27-1103 (Mandatory training for law-enforcement officers relating to response to calls involving family violence); West Virginia Code § 48-27-1104 (Mandatory education on family violence for circuit court judges, family court judges, and magistrates); West Virginia Code § 61-8-9a (Curriculum on parenting skills to avoid child abuse required for secondary-level grades in all State schools).

[11] The first proviso in subsection (c) actually references sections three, five and nine of Article 8 of Chapter 61. Presumably, the proviso was intended to refer to Article 8B offenses; i.e. sexual assault or sexual abuse. The reference to Article 8 is problematic in that section three of Article 8 has been repealed and sections five and seven refer to offenses associated with prostitution. It can be concluded, therefore, that intent of the statute was to refer to Article 8B offenses.

Counsel appointed for any of the parties in abuse and neglect cases must complete at least eight hours of CLE training per each two-year reporting period on child abuse and neglect procedure and practice. After July 1, 2013, any attorney appointed to represent a child must first complete training on representing children that has been approved by the Supreme Court Administrative Office. If no attorney is available who has completed the required training, the court may appoint a competent attorney who has demonstrated knowledge of child welfare law. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(g).

III. WEST VIRGINIA SAFETY ASSESSMENT AND MANAGEMENT SYSTEM (SAMS)

A. Background

The Bureau for Children and Families of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (BCF) recognized a need to change the way it provided child protective services to the children and families of West Virginia. This change occurred due to internal case reviews, poor results in reviews conducted by the federal government and the Department's goal to provide protection to West Virginia's children.

The BCF, along with Action for Child Protection, Inc., designed a child protective services assessment model for West Virginia. Action for Child Protection, Inc. operates the National Resource Center for Child Protective Services (NRCCPS) on behalf of the Children's Bureau, Administration for Children and Families (ACF), U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. The NRCCPS provides training and technical assistance to help State, local, Tribal and other publicly administered or supported child welfare agencies to achieve safety, permanency, and well-being for children and families. This model is based on nationally recognized best practices in child protective services. The purpose of implementing the model is to have a more precise way to respond to children threatened with harm and to engage families in the child protective services process.

This model is an integrated safety assessment system called the West Virginia Safety Assessment and Management System (SAMS). SAMS includes four different assessments that evaluate whether a child is safe.

All SAMS assessment processes have been implemented statewide. A description of each assessment follows.

B. Summary of CPS Assessment Processes

1. Intake Assessment

During the initial assessment or Intake Assessment, a child protective services worker will gather relevant information to determine if a child is abused or neglected or threatened with abuse and neglect, as defined by West Virginia Code § 49-1-201. During the Intake Assessment, the worker will attempt to gather information about maltreatment or harm that has already occurred and other family dynamics that are likely to result in harm to a child. If any child in the home has been abused or neglected, or is subject to conditions where abuse or neglect is likely to occur, the family will be subject to a Family Functioning Assessment. When families do not receive a Family Functioning Assessment, the CPS worker may make appropriate referrals to community resources.

2. Family Functioning Assessment (FFA)

The Family Functioning Assessment (FFA) seeks to engage families and evaluate them to determine if any child in the home is in need of protection. Throughout the FFA, the child protective services worker will gather relevant information to determine if a child has been harmed, or if a child is likely to be harmed or is in "impending danger." If a child is in impending danger, the Department will open an "ongoing" case for services. Additionally, a Protective Capacities Family Assessment will be completed.

3. Protective Capacities Family Assessment (PCFA)

The results of a PCFA are very relevant to an abuse and neglect case because the PCFA will determine the terms of a either the child or family case plan. In turn, the case plan should increase child safety by enhancing the protective capacities of a caregiver. The purpose of the treatment plan, therefore, is to eliminate or reduce impending danger to the point where a family can provide a safe environment for a child.

The protective capacities of a parent or caregiver include behavioral, cognitive and emotional characteristics that are directly associated with a person's ability to adequately protect his or her children. They are "strengths" that are specifically associated with a person's ability to perform effectively as a caregiver or parent and to provide a safe environment for the child. Ongoing CPS social workers, caregivers and multidisciplinary teams should formulate treatment plans that enhance the protective capacities of a parent or caregiver. By doing so, the likelihood of harm to a child should be significantly decreased.

4. Family Case Plan Evaluation

The Family Case Plan Evaluation is a formal decision-making process, which requires involvement from caregivers, children, any service providers, any safety service providers and any other members of the multidisciplinary treatment team. The purpose of the Family Case Plan Evaluation is to measure progress toward achieving the goals of the family case plan, to re-evaluate the status of the threat of harm or impending danger, to re-evaluate the status of the children's needs, and to provide information to the multidisciplinary treatment team. The evaluation should help the treatment team make recommendations to the court concerning the continued necessity for out-of-home placement or concerning any changes to the permanency plan. In order for the Family Case Plan Evaluation to be effective, the goals of the PCFA must have been appropriate.

C. Information Relevant to the Court's Decisions

SAMS is designed to improve the quality of information that is provided to the court. In turn, the improved information should assist the court when it must make the following types of decisions: 1) whether a child should be removed from his or her home; 2) whether a child can be safely returned home; 3) whether the parent is making progress on treatment goals that enhance a child's safety; or 4) whether the permanency plan should be changed because of inadequate progress.

D. Evaluation or Assessment Based on Safety

Perhaps most importantly, SAMS is designed to assist a parent so that he or she is providing a safe environment, as opposed to evaluating whether a parent is simply complying with directives from a caseworker. There are instances in which a parent or caregiver attends parenting classes, has clean drug screens, maintains employment, or attends mental health counseling, and yet has not made the changes necessary to provide a safe home for his or her child.

The purpose of the PCFA, therefore, is to engage the parent in developing goals that, when achieved, would demonstrate that the parent is able to safely care for his or her child. The goals of the PCFA should clearly illustrate the essential characteristics or necessary changes a parent or caregiver must make in order to be able to provide a safe environment for his or her children. Services will then be used to assist the parent in meeting the necessary goals. Services are a means to meet a goal; services must never be the goal or the focus of CPS intervention. After goal development with the family, CPS intervention will focus on engaging the caregivers in meeting the goals and monitoring progress. This emphasis will allow CPS workers to report whether caregivers are making the changes necessary to provide a safe home for their child.

Because SAMS focuses on changes associated with a parent's behaviors, attitudes and emotions, it is likely that some adult respondents will not be successful in a case, even though they have complied with directives and participated in various services. Alternatively, CPS workers may recommend that a child be returned home even if the parent has not complied with all of the requirements associated with a service. In either situation, the CPS social worker should be able to explain to the court, in detail, the reasons for recommendations at various stages of an abuse and neglect case.

E. Basis for Custody

Although the SAMS assessment process involves the completion of four different assessments, it does not foreclose CPS from taking emergency custody of a child and filing petitions in which it seeks the custody of children because of circumstances involving imminent danger. At any point in CPS's involvement with a family, it may file a petition to obtain custody of a child when imminent danger is present. Circumstances in which CPS may seek custody of a child include, but are not limited to, the following:

1. When a report of suspected abuse or neglect has been received and the parents refuse to allow access to the children to be interviewed;

2. The child is unsafe due to a threat of harm and there are no available or appropriate in-home safety responses that would allow the child to safely remain in the home;

3. The child is in imminent danger and there are no appropriate or available safety responses that would allow the child to remain in the home safely;

4. The parent(s) has committed an act which meets the definition of aggravated circumstances or other situations as defined in West Virginia Code § 49-4-602(d); or

5. The child is unsafe due to a threat of harm, an in-home safety plan controls the threat, but the parents have demonstrated that they are incapable of or unwilling to take the actions necessary to reduce the threat to their child so that safety does not have to be controlled by external means.

IV. MEDICAL AND MENTAL EXAMINATIONS

A. Procedure for Court-Ordered Medical and Mental Examinations

West Virginia Code § 49-4-603 specifies the procedure and conditions for court-ordered mental and medical examinations of a child or other parties in abuse and neglect proceedings. The case of In re Daniel D., 562 S.E.2d 147 (W. Va. 2002) provides substantial guidance on questions of immunity from criminal prosecution for statements made during the course of court-ordered examinations in child abuse and neglect case. See also Syl. Pt. 3, State v. James R., 422 S.E.2d 521 (W. Va. 1992). The procedures involved with a court-ordered mental or medical examination follow.

1. At any time during the proceedings, an attorney for a child or attorney for other parties may move for, or the court may order sua sponte, an examination by a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist, and require testimony from such expert.

2. The court cannot terminate parental/custodial rights solely for refusal to submit to an examination, nor may the court hold such person in contempt for such failure or refusal.

3. The expert (physician, psychologist or psychiatrist) may testify as to any conclusions reached from hospital, medical, psychological or laboratory records, provided they are produced at the hearing.

4. The State will be responsible for payment if the child, parent or custodian is indigent. (With regard to the payment of expert fees, see the discussion below.)

5. No evidence acquired as the result of such examination of any parent/custodian may be used against such person in subsequent criminal proceedings.

B. Medical Examination of a Child Before Petition Is Filed

1. Subsection (b) of West Virginia Code § 49-4-603 allows any person[12] with authority to file an abuse or neglect petition to apply to the circuit judge or juvenile referee for a medical examination before an abuse or neglect proceeding has been initiated if there is probable cause to believe that evidence of abuse or neglect may be found by such an examination.

[12] Either a reputable person or representative from the Department may file an abuse and neglect petition. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(a).

2. Upon the presentation of sufficient evidence, the judge or referee may order law-enforcement to take the child into custody for the examination. If a referee finds that a child must be subject to an examination, he or she must obtain oral confirmation from a judge in his or her circuit or in an adjoining circuit. In turn, the judge, on the next judicial day, must enter an order confirming the referee's order.

3. A CPS worker, the child's parents, guardians or custodians may accompany the law enforcement officer to the examination.

4. At the end of the examination, the law enforcement officer may return the child to the custody of his or her parent, guardian or custodian. Alternatively, the officer may retain custody of the child or place the child in the custody of the Department until the end of the next judicial day. At that time, the child must be returned to his parent, guardian or custodian unless an abuse and neglect petition has been filed and custody has been transferred to the Department. W. Va. Code § 49-4-603(b).

C. Court-Ordered Examination By Other Experts

In addition to the medical and mental examinations authorized by West Virginia Code § 49-4-603, the court may order parties to undergo examinations by experts who are not physicians, psychologists, or psychiatrists and may enter a protective order with regard to W. Va. Code § 57-2-3, a statute that provides use immunity for statements made "upon a legal examination." Daniel D., 562 S.E.2d 147. A person is entitled to have the court establish the protections afforded by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 in a protective order.

D. Payment for Court-Ordered Medical and Mental Examinations

The authority for the establishment of expert witness fees is governed by a combination of statutes, rules and caselaw. In a mandamus action addressing the payment of expert witness fees, the Supreme Court concluded that a circuit court retains the ultimate authority to determine compensation for expert witnesses in abuse and neglect cases. Hewitt v. DHHR, 575 S.E.2d 308 (W. Va. 2002). Hewitt did not, however, resolve who is responsible for payment of expert witnesses in abuse and neglect cases.

In the case of In re Chevie V., 700 S.E.2d 815 (W. Va. 2010), the Court reviewed relevant cases and the amalgam of statutes and rules that govern this issue. After an initial review of the applicable authority, the Court determined that the question presented was a matter of first impression.

In Chevie V., the Court held that the circuit court had the discretion to require the Department to pay the expert witness pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-7-33, the statute that, at that time, allowed the Department to establish a fee schedule according to the Medicaid rate. However, the Court also held that the Department would not be liable for payment at the rate of the expert witness fee schedule established by the Public Defender Corporation. Rather, the Department would be liable for payment pursuant to its own fee schedule.

It should be noted that the Supreme Court determined that Trial Court Rules 27.01 and 27.02 did not govern payment in Chevie V. because the circuit court did not appoint the expert. Rather, the circuit court simply approved a request by the mother's attorney to hire an expert. Under Trial Court Rules 27.01 and 27.02, the Department is liable for payment for an expert witness's report writing, consultation or other preparation, and the Supreme Court's Administrative Office is liable for an expert's fees and expenses related to appearing and testifying. It can be concluded, however, that the payment provisions in Trial Court Rules 27.01 and 27.02 would apply when a circuit court appoints an expert in an abuse and neglect case.

It should also be noted that the Court analyzed Trial Court Rule 35.05(b) and West Virginia Code § 29-21-13a(e), provisions that require the Public Defender Corporation to pay expert witness fees in eligible proceedings. In Chevie V., the Supreme Court held that the provisions were general and that the more specific provisions in West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 were dispositive of the issue. For a complete discussion of Chevie V., see Caselaw Digest, Section II, J. Advance Approval of Expert Fees.

The relevant statute is now found at West Virginia Code § 49-4-108.

V. CRIMINAL OFFENSES INVOLVING ABUSE AND NEGLECT OF CHILDREN

Beyond the protections afforded generally to all persons under the criminal statutes, various provisions are specifically designed to deter and punish offenses against children, and provide special protection to child-victims of crimes.

A. Criminal Offenses Against Children

West Virginia Code §§ 61-8D-1, et seq. defines the various conduct generally constituting criminal offenses of child abuse and neglect that are committed by parents, guardians, custodians or persons in a position of trust to a child. Additional specific criminal offenses involving abuse or neglect of children are principally found in West Virginia Code §§ 61-8C-1, et seq. (Filming of Sexually Explicit Conduct of Minors), West Virginia Code §§ 61-8A-1, et seq. (Preparation, Distribution or Exhibition of Obscene Matter to Minors) and West Virginia Code § 49-4-901 (Contributing to Delinquency or Neglect of a Child).

B. Protections for Child Victims of Crime

A number of statutes provide specific protections for child-victims relating to the investigation, trial, sentencing, and release of persons charged and convicted of criminal offenses against children. West Virginia Code § 15-2-15 (Establishment of a State Police Child Abuse and Neglect Investigations Unit); West Virginia Code § 61-8-13; 61-8B-14; and 61-8C-5 (Limits on interviews of children 11 years old or less); West Virginia Code §§ 62-6B-1, et seq. (Closed-circuit testimony of child victims testifying in criminal matters involving charges of sexual assault/abuse); West Virginia Code § 61-11A-3(d) (Victim impact statement in a presentence report involving specified offenses against a child may include a statement from a therapist providing treatment to the child-victim as to recommendations regarding the effect that possible disposition may have on child); West Virginia Code § 61-11A-8 (Notification to child-victim's parent upon release of convicted person from correctional facility); West Virginia Code § 62-1C-17a (Bail in situations of child abuse); West Virginia Code § 62-1C-17c (Bail in cases of crimes between family or household members); West Virginia Code § 62-11A-1(g) (Protections afforded children from those convicted of child offenses who are granted work-release privileges); West Virginia Code § 62-11B-6(d) (Protections afforded victims from those who are granted home confinement); West Virginia Code §§ 62-12-7 & 7a (Pre-sentence investigations and reports involving offenses against children); West Virginia Code § 62-12-9(a)(4) (Protections afforded children from those convicted of child offenses who are released on probation); West Virginia Code § 62-12-17(a)(4) (Protections afforded children from those convicted of child offenses who are released on parole); West Virginia Code § 62-12-26 (Protections afforded children from those convicted of sexually violent offenses against children and who are serving a period of supervised release); West Virginia Code § 15-2C-2 (Relating to Central Abuse Registry identifying persons convicted of crimes involving abuse and neglect); and West Virginia Code §§ 15-13-1, et seq. (Requiring persons convicted of child abuse or neglect crimes to register with the State Police).

C. Additional Finding Upon Conviction

Various statutory provisions also mandate that upon a conviction of person for a crime against a child, when the person has any custodial, visitation or other parental rights to the child, the court shall make a finding that the convicted person is an "abusing parent" within the meaning of the abuse and neglect provisions of Chapter 49 of the Code. West Virginia Code § 61-8-12(e) (Incest); West Virginia Code § 61-8B-11a (Sexual Offenses); West Virginia Code § 61-8D-9 (Child Abuse); see also West Virginia Code § 49-4-609. The court is authorized to take further action as allowed by Part VI, Article 4 of Chapter 49.

VI. CONTRARY-TO-WELFARE AND REASONABLE EFFORTS FINDINGS

A. Background

The requirement that any removal of a child be based upon a judicial finding that continuation of the child in the home is contrary of the welfare of the child was the first of the existing protections afforded to children and their families by the federal foster care program. The contrary-to-welfare requirement has been in effect since the inception of the federal program in 1961. The additional requirement that states make reasonable efforts to prevent placement and reunify families was introduced into child welfare proceedings in 1980 under the Federal Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act. Both the contrary-to-welfare and reasonable efforts requirements have continued as core concepts in American child welfare practices. More recently, the Federal Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997 (and implementing regulations) refined and expanded these concepts. In addition to the reasonable efforts required to prevent removal and to reunify families, federal law also now requires states to demonstrate reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan in a timely manner once the child is temporarily placed in foster care.

The contrary-to-welfare and reasonable efforts requirements must be reflected in judicial findings, which must be both timely and specific. Once a child is removed from the home (temporarily or permanently), the State is eligible for 3-to-1 federal matching funds under Title IV-E of the Social Security Act for the duration of the child's stay in foster care. If a child's removal from home is not based on a judicial determination that it was contrary to the child's welfare to remain in the home, the State is ineligible for Title IV-E funding for the entire foster care episode subsequent to that removal.[13] When findings of reasonable efforts to prevent removal are negative, insufficient, late or missing, the loss of eligibility for federal foster care matching funds will also be for the duration of the child's stay in foster care. If emergency circumstances support the conclusion that it was reasonable to make no efforts to prevent removal under the particular facts, this determination must be adequately and timely stated in the court's order. Later in the case, when findings of reasonable efforts to finalize a child's permanency plan are negative, insufficient, late or missing, the State will be ineligible for federal matching funds for the child until there are positive and sufficient findings addressing this area of critical concern.

[13] In circumstances involving a child placed in foster care as the result of a voluntary placement agreement, within the first 180 days of the placement there must be a judicial determination to the effect that the continued placement is in the best interests of the child. Without this finding, the child's placement will no longer be eligible for federal funding once the 6-month deadline has passed.

B. Required Judicial Findings

1. Contrary to Welfare

A child's removal from the home must have been the result of a judicial determination (unless the child was removed pursuant to a voluntary placement agreement) to the effect that continuation in the home would be contrary to the welfare, or that placement would be in the best interest, of the child. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(c). The judicial determination need not necessarily use the exact terminology of the statute or regulation, so long as the language conveys that the court has determined that it would be contrary to the welfare of the child to remain at home or that placement would be in the child's best interest.

2. Reasonable Efforts to Prevent Removal

Unless an exception applies, when a child is removed from the home, the court must make findings as to whether the State made reasonable efforts to maintain the family and prevent the unnecessary removal of a child, and to make it possible for the child to safely return home (after a temporary placement necessary to ensure immediate safety). 42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(15)(B) and (D); 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(b). As stated above regarding contrary to welfare findings, exact terminology is not necessary, but the language of the order must convey that the court has determined that reasonable efforts have been made or were not required.

3. Reasonable Efforts to Finalize Permanency Plan

Consistent with 42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(15)(C), the State must obtain a judicial determination that it has made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan in a timely manner. This finding must be made without regard to the type of permanency plan that is in effect (whether the plan is reunification, adoption, legal guardianship, placement with a relative, or placement in another planned permanent living arrangement). Federal law recognizes concurrent planning as part of reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan. 42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(15)(F); 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(b)(4).

4. New Findings

If a trial home visit (e.g. improvement period) exceeds six months without court authorization, or exceeds the time period the court has deemed appropriate, and the child is subsequently returned to foster care, that must be considered a new placement and Title IV-E eligibility re-established. Accordingly, the judicial determinations regarding contrary to welfare and reasonable efforts would again be required. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(e).

C. Determinations that Reasonable Efforts Not Required

The State is not required to make efforts to prevent placement or reunify the family where such efforts will endanger a child's health or safety. Federal law states that "in determining reasonable efforts to be made with respect to a child . . . and in making such efforts, the child's health and safety shall be the paramount concern." 42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(15)(A). In addition, reasonable efforts to preserve the family are not required if a court finds that the parent has: subjected the child or another child to aggravated circumstances (as defined in State law – such as abandonment, torture, chronic abuse, and sexual abuse); committed certain serious criminal acts against the child, against another child, or the other parent; the parental rights of a sibling have been terminated involuntarily; or has been required by law to register as a sex offender. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(7); see also 42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(15)(D); 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(b)(3). Finally, even if none of the specific circumstances applies, courts may exercise discretion, in individual cases, to protect the health and safety or children. 42 U.S.C. § 678. As discussed in the federal commentary accompanying the promulgation of the final regulations:

> [T]he statute should not be construed to support unwarranted attempts to preserve families. Rather, when reasonable efforts are required, the State agency and the courts must determine the level of effort that is reasonable, based on safety considerations and the circumstances of the family. Sometimes, based on its assessment of a family, the State agency determines that it is reasonable to make no effort to maintain the child in the home or to reunify the child and family. In such circumstances, if the court determines that the agency's assessment of the family is accurate and its actions were appropriate, the court should find that the agency's efforts in such cases were reasonable, not that reasonable efforts were not required. 65 Fed. Reg. 4053 (Jan. 25, 2000).

D. Timing of Required Findings

The timing of each of the required findings is specific to the particular events occurring in a case. The "removal" date and the different procedural stages in the case are generally the key factors in identifying the deadlines applicable to a case. There are three different deadlines for judicial findings that strictly govern eligibility for federal foster care matching funds.

1. Contrary to Welfare

The Title IV-E regulations provide that findings to the effect that continuation of the child in the home would be contrary to the child's welfare must be made in the first court order sanctioning or authorizing the child's removal (even temporarily) from the home. If this determination is not made in the first order pertaining to removal, the child is not eligible for Title IV-E foster care funds for the duration of that stay in foster care. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(c). Although removal could occur at any stage of the proceedings, orders which most often involve the first removal include: (i) Order Ratifying Emergency Custody; (ii) Initial Order Following Petition (ten-day temporary custody); (iii) Order Following Preliminary Hearing; or (iv) Disposition Order.

2. Reasonable Efforts to Prevent Removal

The judicial findings regarding reasonable efforts by the Department to prevent placement (or that such efforts were not required under the particular circumstances) must be made within 60 days following the removal of the child from home. If this determination is not made within this time period, the child is not eligible for Title IV-E foster care payments for the duration of that stay in foster care. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(b)(1). In most cases, the best practice is to make this finding at the time of the initial removal (along with the contrary to welfare finding). Otherwise, this finding may be inadvertently omitted during the 60-day time frame.

3. Reasonable Efforts to Finalize Permanent Placement

Findings by the court as to whether the Department has made reasonable efforts to finalize the child's permanency plan must be made within 12 months of the date the child is considered to have entered foster care, and at least once every 12 months thereafter. If the determination is not made, the child becomes ineligible for Title VI-E payments at the end of the month in which the finding should have been made and remains ineligible until such a judicial determination is made. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(b)(2). A child is "considered to have entered foster care" on the date the court found that the child was abused or neglected, or 60 days following the child's actual removal from home, which ever comes first. 45 C.F.R. § 1355.20.

The permanency hearing requirement generally follows the same 12-month timeframe as the findings regarding reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan. 42 U.S.C. § 675(5)(C). There is an exception to this timeframe when a court determines at any stage of the proceedings that reasonable efforts to return the child home are not required; then the permanency hearing must be held within 30 days of that determination. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(h)(2). (See Chapter 3, Section XII for a more detailed discussion of permanency hearing requirements.) However, the permanency hearing requirement is not a Title IV-E eligibility criterion. If a permanency hearing is not timely conducted under the applicable (12-month or 30-day) timeframe, the child does not become ineligible for Title IV-E funding. The pertinent concern for Title IV-E purposes is the finding at least once every 12 months that the Department made reasonable efforts to finalize the child's permanency plan. The best practice to follow in this regard is to make the reasonable-efforts-to-finalize findings in every hearing (and accompanying order) after the permanency plan is established as part of the child's case plan. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(a). This will be more than sufficient to satisfy the 12-month timeframe for such findings.

E. Documentation of Judicial Findings

The judicial determinations regarding contrary to welfare, reasonable efforts to prevent removal, and reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan in a timely manner, (and any determinations that reasonable efforts are not required), must be "explicitly documented" and "made on a case-by-case basis" in the pertinent court orders. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(d). Regulation commentary acknowledges the administrative burdens imposed by explicit and case-by-case findings, and suggests a number of ways to provide detailed findings, including: (i) descriptions in the court order findings; (ii) language in the court order that specifically cross-references detailed statements in an agency or other report submitted to the court; (iii) language of the court order that cross-references to facts in a sustained petition; or (iv) checking off items from a detailed checklist. 65 Fed. Reg. 4056.

If the contrary to welfare or reasonable efforts determinations are not included in the required court orders, a transcript of the court hearing in which the findings were made is the only acceptable substitute. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(d)(1). Neither affidavits from hearing participants nor nunc pro tunc orders are accepted. 45 C.F.R. § 1356.21(d)(2).

F. West Virginia Statutes

Although receipt of Title IV-E funding in cases involving out-of-home placement is dependent upon compliance with the federal requirements, several West Virginia statutes assist with compliance by inclusion of the contrary to welfare and reasonable efforts requirements.

First, the initial order granting temporary (ten-day) custody calls for both contrary to welfare and reasonable efforts to prevent removal findings. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-105; 49-4-602. When appropriate, the petition should provide detail about supportive services that the Department or others provided to remedy the circumstances. W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(b); Rule 18(c). This information should assist the court with its findings concerning reasonable efforts to prevent removal.

Secondly, if temporary custody is granted during a preliminary hearing, the contrary to welfare and reasonable efforts to prevent removal findings are similarly required. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-105; 49-4-602(b). Upon consideration of temporary custody pursuant to either West Virginia Code § 49-4-602(a) or (b), the circumstances when the court may find that the State was not required to make efforts to prevent removal are specified. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(d); see also W. Va. Code § 49-4-105. These situations generally involve aggravated circumstances.

Third, if an order at the disposition stage involves temporary custody, the contrary to welfare and reasonable efforts to prevent removal findings are required. W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-105; 49-4-604(b)(5). Fourth, both types of findings are likewise required in any disposition involving termination of parental rights. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6). Finally, the circumstances are set out as to when reasonable efforts to preserve the family are not required before out-of-home placement at the disposition stage. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(7).

When a court conducts permanency hearings, West Virginia Code § 49-4-608(b) requires a court to determine whether the Department has made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan. See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-110(c). A permanency hearing must be conducted within 12 months of the time that the Department obtained physical custody of a child, provided that the Department was required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family. If a court finds that the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, then the permanency hearing must be conducted within 30 days of the entry of the court order that includes this finding. W. Va. Code § 49-4-608.

The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings have incorporated the reasonable efforts to finalize placement determination in the court review process. See, e.g., Rules 41(a) and 42(a). Additionally, Rule 28, the rule governing the child's case plan, indicates that the permanency plan and concurrent plan should be designed to achieve timely permanency in the least restrictive setting available. Further, Rule 43 indicates that permanency should be achieved within 12 months of the final disposition order. These statutes and rules, therefore, require the court to make findings as to whether the Department has made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan in a timely manner and should assist with meeting federal requirements.

G. Common Court Order Language Problems in Abuse and Neglect Cases

The following are some common problems with Title IV-E findings in court orders in abuse and neglect cases.

1. The complete absence of "contrary to welfare of child" or "best interest of child" findings in the initial removal order.

2. The order notes that the petitioner alleges in the petition that it would be contrary to the welfare of the child to remain in the home and that the Department has made reasonable efforts to prevent the need for the removal. While noting these allegations does not hurt, there must be a finding by the court as to these two issues – contrary to welfare of the child and reasonable efforts to prevent removal.

3. Finding that it is in the best interest of someone or something other than the child to remove the child from the home, i.e., that it is in the best interest of society to remove the child from the home.

4. Finding that there is "no other reasonable alternative to removal of the child" instead of whether or not the Department made reasonable efforts to prevent removal or whether or not reasonable efforts were possible.

5. Giving the Department legal custody, but allowing the child to remain in the home while giving the Department permission to remove the child at their discretion. It is, of course, inconsistent to find that it is contrary to the welfare of the child to remain in the home, but at the same time allowing the child to remain in the home. Therefore, if the Department is given custody, but the child is permitted to remain in the home with the authority of the Department to remove the child, there must be another hearing (simultaneous with removal) where there are findings on the issues of "contrary to welfare of the child" and "reasonable efforts." See Rule 16(d) and (e).

6. Any reference to reasonable efforts being left out of the initial removal order. Reasonable efforts findings should be in the initial order; it is often very hard to get a follow-up order with a reasonable efforts statement within the required 60-day limit.

7. A general reference to the State code requirements to substantiate findings. The findings as to contrary to the welfare of the child and reasonable efforts must be case specific.

VII. CHILD SUPPORT

A. Establishment of Support

It is generally established that the court should address child support when a child is placed in the custody of Department or the custodial or decision-making responsibility for the child is altered. Rule 16a; W. Va. Code § 49-4-801. It is within the sole jurisdiction of the circuit court to establish a child support obligation. Syl. Pt. 3, DHHR v. Smith, 624 S.E.2d 917 (W. Va. 2005). The case may not be transferred or remanded to the family court for assessment of the child support obligation. Rules 16a and 17(c)(5). In general, the provisions of Part VIII, Article 4 of Chapter 49 should be construed as consistent with the relevant articles of Chapter 48 of the West Virginia Code. The primary authority governing child support is found in Article 13 of Chapter 48.

When a child is removed from his or her home, the circuit court is required to issue a support order payable by the child's mother. W. Va. Code § 49-4-801(c). If a child's legal father has been determined, then the court shall enter a support order payable by the child's legal father. If the child's legal father has not been determined, the court should address paternity. Upon the establishment of the paternity of the child, the court should enter a support order payable by the legal father. When the court enters an order addressing child support, copies of the order should be provided to the Bureau for Child Support Enforcement.

Although the statute indicates that a court "shall" enter a support order if a child is removed from the home, the court has the discretion, as allowed by the statute, to vary the amount established by the child support guidelines. See W. Va. Code § 48-13-702. In addition to the allowances established in Chapter 48, the court may enter a support order that departs from the guidelines in the following instances: 1) deviation from the guidelines may assist the parent to successfully complete an improvement period; 2) it is in the child's best interests to issue a zero child support order; and/or 3) the parent has no gross income. W. Va. Code § 49-4-801(e).

If there is a pre-existing child support order in effect, for example a prior family court order, the support obligation will automatically continue until the abuse and neglect court issues a superseding order. W. Va. Code § 49-4-802(a). If a child is returned to the physical custody of a parent, the support obligation automatically ceases. Even if an order terminating the obligation is not entered, a parent cannot be held responsible for the payment of child support for a time period in which the parent has physical custody of the child. W. Va. Code § 49-4-802(b). If a child abuse and neglect case is dismissed for failure to prove the allegations, any support provision is considered void ab initio. W. Va. Code § 49-4-802(c).

B. Calculation of Support

At the initial hearing in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, the circuit court must require the parents to complete financial statements forms to determine the amount of any child support obligation. Rule 17(c)(5). When establishing a support order, the circuit court must apply the Guidelines for Child Support found in West Virginia Code §§ 48-13-101, et seq., unless the court makes specific findings that the use of the Guidelines is inappropriate. Rule 16a(b); W. Va. Code § 48-13-702. West Virginia Code § 49-4-801(e) establishes additional reasons for deviating from the Child Support Guidelines. These reasons include the following: 1) deviation from the guidelines may assist the parent to successfully complete an improvement period; 2) it is in the child's best interests to issue a zero child support order; and/or 3) the parent has no gross income.

The child support award should be based on the combined gross monthly income of both parents using the table found in West Virginia Code § 48-13-301. West Virginia Code § 48-1-205 provides that, under some circumstances, the court may attribute income to a responsible party who is unemployed or underemployed. If necessary, the court may order the withholding of support from the wages of the person liable for support.

The lowest combined monthly gross income on the table in West Virginia Code § 48-13-301 is $550 per month. When the income of the respondent(s) is below this amount, the court may set the child support obligation at $50 per month or other discretionary amount based upon the resources, living expenses and other child support obligations of the respondent(s).

If a court determines that it should not impose a support obligation, it should impose a zero support obligation. Imposing a zero support obligation assists the BCSE with its statutorily mandated obligation to collect child support.

C. Modification

Once a circuit court has established a child support obligation, either by establishing an initial support obligation or modifying an existing support obligation, the circuit court may not remand the case to family court for future modification or enforcement proceedings. Syl. Pt. 5, J.L., 763 S.E.2d 654. Modifications of a support order may be made by the court on the motion of any party if there is a substantial change in circumstances. Rule 16a; W. Va. Code § 48-11-105. A substantial change in circumstances includes situations in which there would be a child support obligation that is more than 15% different than the current obligation. An order modifying a support obligation must also follow the Guidelines for Child Support, unless the court specifically finds that the guidelines should not apply. J.L., 763 S.E.2d at 661. Rules 16a and 46; W. Va. Code §§ 48-11-105; 49-4-801(e). The standard of proof for modifying a support order is the preponderance of evidence. Rule 46.

D. Enforcement of Support Orders

Once a circuit court establishes a child support obligation, it retains jurisdiction over the enforcement of the support order pursuant to Rule 6.[14] Syl. Pt. 4, In the Interest of J.L., 763 S.E.2d 654 (W. Va. 2014). Under Rule 16a(d), the circuit court cannot transfer or remand the case to the family court for subsequent enforcement proceedings. Support orders may be enforced through any of the methods established by Chapters 38 and 48 of the West Virginia Code.

If a parent fails to pay child support, the BCSE may bring a contempt action. In addition, the DHHR's Bureau for Children and Families may initiate contempt proceedings. Further, the child's physical custodian, the child's guardian ad litem or the prosecuting attorney may pursue contempt proceedings for the parents' failure to pay child support. W. Va. Code § 49-4-803(b).

E. Post-Termination Child Support

Once a circuit court enters a support order, the support obligation will automatically continue beyond the termination of parental rights unless the court expressly terminates the support obligation in an order. W. Va. Code § 49-4-802(d). See also Syl. Pt. 2, In re Ryan B., 686 S.E.2d 601 (W. Va. 2009); Syl. Pt. 7, In re Stephen Tyler R., 584 S.E.2d 581 (W. Va. 2003). This requirement applies to terminations that occur as a result of a voluntary relinquishment or an adverse judicial determination. Ryan B. The circuit court, however, retains jurisdiction to prospectively modify a post-termination child support order. Syl. Pt. 8, Stephen Tyler R.

[14] Since Rule 6 was the basis for the Court's holding in J.L., the exception established by Rule 6, when a circuit court returns a child to his or her cohabitating parents without entering a visitation or support order that Alters the relationship of the parents, would serve as the one situation in which a circuit court would not retain jurisdiction over a future child support matter between the parents.

F. Other Support Matters

The court may also consider addressing medical support for the child pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-12-102, and the inclusion of the language required by West Virginia Code § 48-11-102 in the order establishing child support.

VIII. PARTICIPATION OF THE CHILD IN HEARINGS AND MULTIDISCIPLINARY TREATMENT TEAM MEETINGS

Note: A child's attendance at hearings or multidisciplinary treatment team meetings is distinct from testimony which is governed by subsections (a) through (c) of Rule 8 and Rule 9.

Rule 8(d) provides that a child may attend hearings or parts of hearings unless the court determines that such attendance is inappropriate. Similarly, a child may participate in multidisciplinary treatment team meetings unless the team finds it is inappropriate. See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-405(b) (providing that a child may attend a multidisciplinary treatment team meeting if the team determines that the child's attendance is appropriate). Factors that should be considered are the child's preferences and developmental maturity. Certainly, the guardian ad litem's recommendation should be given weigh t in making this decision. See generally Appendix A, Jeffrey R. L., 435 S.E.2d 162 (W. Va. 1993).

If a child is 14 years of age or older or is otherwise of an age of discretion, the court is required to consider the child's wishes concerning the termination of parental rights. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)(C). Noting this statutory requirement, the Supreme Court has held that a child's preferences about the termination of parental rights should be considered when the child is of an age of discretion. In the Interest of Jessica G., 697 S.E.2d 53 (W. Va. 2010); In re Ashton M., 723 S.E.2d 409 (W. Va. 2012).

The permanency hearing is another juncture at which a child's input or attendance is crucial. As established by West Virginia Code § 49-4-608(b), a child who is 12 years of age or older is entitled to notice of the permanency hearing. Also, a child who is 12 years of age or older has the right to be present at the permanency hearing. This right may, however, be waived by the child's attorney at the child's request. The child's attorney may waive the child's right to be present if the child is younger than 12 years old and would suffer emotional harm.

With regard to the implementation of a permanency plan, a child who is 12 years of age or older must consent to an adoption. W. Va. Code § 48-22-301(f). Further, the West Virginia Supreme Court has recognized that a child's preferences regarding placement with a particular parent should be considered. In re Frances J.A.S., 584 S.E.2d 492 (W. Va. 2003); In the Matter of Bryanna H., 695 S.E.2d 889 (W. Va. 2010).

IX. INDIAN CHILD WELFARE ACT

The Indian Child Welfare Act ("ICWA") was enacted by Congress in 1978. (codified at 25 U.S.C. §§ 1901, et seq.) ICWA was enacted to address the congressional findings that there is an "alarmingly high percentage" of Indian families broken up by the "often unwarranted" removal of children by non-tribal agencies; and that an alarmingly high percentage of the children are placed in non-Indian foster and adoptive homes.

Accordingly, Congress has stated its intention to protect the best interest of Indian children and to promote the stability and security of Indian tribes and families. ICWA establishes minimum federal standards for the removal of Indian children from their families. Additionally, the Act imposes several criteria to better assure the placement of any removed child in foster-adoptive homes which will reflect the unique values of Indian culture. 25 U.S.C. §§ 1901 and 1902.

A. When ICWA Applies

The Indian Child Welfare Act applies in abuse and neglect proceedings when an "Indian child" is removed from his or her parent or Indian custodian for placement in a home or institution (including foster care) in circumstances when the parent or custodian cannot have the child returned upon demand. 25 U.S.C. § 1903(1).

An "Indian child" is defined as:

- An unmarried person under the age of 18 who is:
- a member of a federally-recognized Indian tribe; OR
- the biological child of a member of a federally-recognized Indian tribe; and
- The child is eligible for membership in any federally-recognized Indian tribe. 25 U.S.C. § 1903(4).

B. Jurisdiction

Upon finding that ICWA applies to an abuse and neglect proceeding, a determination should be made as to whether there is exclusive tribal jurisdiction or whether the circuit court may retain jurisdiction over the case subject to the other ICWA provisions.

Exclusive Tribal Jurisdiction

The child's Indian tribe has exclusive jurisdiction over the proceeding if the child resides in or is domiciled in the reservation of the tribe or when the child is a ward of the tribal court. 25 U.S.C. § 1911(a).

However, the circuit court may order the temporary removal of an Indian child who resides in or is domiciled on a reservation but temporarily located elsewhere if such removal is necessary to prevent imminent physical harm to a child. 25 U.S.C. § 1922.

In cases where there is no exclusive tribal jurisdiction, the circuit court must transfer the case to the tribal court if requested to do so by one of the child's parents, the tribe, or the child's Indian custodian (as defined by 25 U.S.C. § 1903(6)). The circuit court may refuse to transfer the case to the tribal court if:

- The circuit court finds good cause not to transfer the case; or
- One of the child's parents objects to the transfer; or
- The tribal court declines to accept jurisdiction.

C. Notice Requirements

In cases where there is no exclusive tribal jurisdiction, the petitioner in the circuit court proceeding must provide written notice to the Indian child's parent or Indian custodian, and the child's tribe. The notice must be served by certified mail, return receipt requested and must include a statement that the notified party has a right to intervene in the proceedings. If the identity or location of the parent or custodian and the tribe cannot be determined, notice must be given to the Secretary of the Interior. The proceeding cannot proceed until at least ten days have passed after receipt of notice. Even after such ten days has passed, the parent, custodian, or tribe, must be granted an additional 20 days to prepare for the proceeding if a request is made for such additional time. 25 U.S.C. § 1912.

D. Other ICWA Provisions

1. Placement

a. Foster Care

No foster care placement may be ordered in an ICWA case without a finding that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the child. The finding must be supported by:

- Clear and convincing evidence; including
- Testimony of a qualified expert witness.

25 U.S.C. § 1912(e).

If a parent or Indian custodian consents to foster care placement, the consent can be revoked at any time and the child must be returned to the parent or Indian custodian. 25 U.S.C. § 1913(b).

Furthermore, any consent by a parent or Indian custodian to a foster care placement or to termination of parental rights must be made in writing and placed on the court's record, and the court must certify that the terms and consequences of the consent were fully explained in detail and were understood by the parent or custodian. 25 U.S.C. § 1913.

b. Termination

As with any out-of-home placement, prior to terminating a parent's rights, the court must find that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the child. The finding must be supported by:

- Evidence beyond a reasonable doubt; including
- Testimony of a qualified expert witness.

25 U.S.C. § 1912(f).

2. Remedial Services

Prior to the removal of an Indian child from his or her home, and prior to termination of a parent's rights, the court must be satisfied that "active" efforts have been made to prevent breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have been unsuccessful. 25 U.S.C. § 1912(d).

3. Placement Criteria

An Indian child placed in foster care must be placed in the least restrictive setting which most closely approximates a family and in which his or her special needs must be met. The child must also be placed with reasonable proximity to his or her home, and placement preferences must be given, in the absence of good cause, with:

- A member of the child's extended family;
- A licensed foster home approved or specified by the Indian child's tribe;
- An Indian foster home licensed or approved by an authorized non-Indian licensing authority; or
- An institution for children approved by the tribe or operated by an Indian organization.

Presumably, the above-stated preferences must be applied in the order in which they are listed unless the tribe specifies otherwise. ICWA further requires that the standards to be applied in meeting the preference requirements must be the "prevailing social and cultural standards of the Indian community." 25 U.S.C. § 1915(b), (c) and (d).

E. Remedy for Violations

A parent, Indian custodian, and the tribe may petition the court to invalidate any removal or termination of an Indian child upon a showing that such action violated provisions of ICWA. 25 U.S.C. § 1914.

X. PRE-PETITION PROCEEDINGS RELATING TO CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Although only circuit courts have jurisdiction to handle child abuse and neglect cases, allegations and information regarding child maltreatment sometimes arise in other types of cases properly before the family courts. In limited circumstances, explained below, a family court judge may order the Department to take emergency custody of a child. In addition, a referral and investigative process has been established by the following rules: Rules 48 and 48a, Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court (RFC); Rules 16a and 25a, Rules of Practice and Procedure for Domestic Violence Civil Proceedings (RDVCP); Rule 13, Rules for Minor Guardianship Proceedings; and Rule 3a, Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings (RPCANP). All of these rules are commonly referred to as the "overlap" rules. They outline specialized procedures that may be invoked when abuse and neglect allegations arise in certain types of family court cases.

A. Family Court: Temporary Emergency Custody Orders

In addition to the referral and investigative process explained below, a family court judge is authorized to order the Department to take temporary emergency custody of a child in specific circumstances. W. Va. Code § 49-4-302. For a child to be subject to this type of limited emergency custody order, he or she must be in the physical custody of a party to an action or proceeding before family court. By clear and convincing evidence, the family court judge must find that there is imminent danger to the physical well-being of a child; that the child is not subject to a case pending in circuit court that involves allegations of abuse and neglect and that there are no reasonably available alternatives to emergency custody. W. Va. Code § 49-4-302(a). Unless an abuse and neglect petition is later filed, the period of emergency custody may not exceed 96 hours. W.Va. Code § 49-4-302(f)(1).

As contemplated by the statute, the family court should enter a written order, and it must include case-specific findings that explain the basis for emergency custody. Once the order is issued, it must be transmitted to the Department, the circuit court and prosecuting attorney. When the Department receives this type of emergency custody order, it is required to assist the family court judge with placement of the child.

The statute establishes a preference for placing a child with an appropriate relative. W. Va. Code § 49-4-302(g)(1). A worker who assumes custody of a child as a result of a family court order is required to notify the following persons: any parents, grandparents, guardians or custodians of the child, provided that they are known or can be reasonably located. The worker is authorized to disclose the basis for the temporary custody order to these relatives. If none of these persons can be located or contacted, the worker should notify the child's closest relative, if possible, and explain the reasons for the emergency custody order. If an appropriate relative or neighbor of the child is willing to care for the child, the worker should place the child in that person's care or custody. Although foster care is not specifically mentioned in the statute, it certainly would be an option if no relative or neighbor could assume custody. If there are no other reasonably available alternatives, the Department may place the child in an emergency shelter.

When a circuit court receives an emergency custody order from family court, it is required to enter an administrative order that directs the Department to submit an investigative report to both the family and circuit courts within 96 hours from the time the child is placed in the Department's custody. The report must indicate whether the Department will file a child abuse and neglect petition based upon its investigation. W. Va. Code § 49-4-302(e).

An order of temporary emergency custody issued by a family court can only last 96 hours, if no further action is taken. Otherwise, it will expire by operation of law at the end of this 96-hour time period. If the Department files a child abuse and neglect petition, the temporary custody order will automatically be extended until a preliminary hearing is conducted in the circuit court, unless the circuit court orders otherwise. W. Va. Code § 49-4-302(f).

B. Administrative Proceedings Arising from Domestic Relations or Domestic Violence Cases

During the course of a domestic relations case involving issues of custody or visitation of minor children, a family court may obtain information giving reasonable cause to suspect that a child (or children) has been abused or neglected. Similarly, allegations in a domestic violence proceeding may give rise to such reasonable suspicions of child maltreatment. In these circumstances, the family court, in writing, must immediately report the suspected abuse or neglect to the Child Protective Services (CPS) Office in the county where the family court case is pending.[15] When the written referral is sent to CPS, a copy is also transmitted by the family court to the circuit court in the county where the family court case is pending. See Rule 48(b), RFC; Rules 16a and 25a(a), RDVCP. In each circuit, the chief circuit judge should determine if the copies of the CPS referral letters should all be directed to the chief judge, to another designated circuit judge, or handled on a rotational basis. A copy of the referral letter is also to be placed, under seal, in the family court case file by the circuit clerk.

Upon receiving a written referral from a family court, the circuit court is required to promptly issue and have served an administrative order in the name of and regarding the affected child or children. The administrative order will direct CPS to investigate the suspected child maltreatment and submit a report to the circuit court; or appear at a scheduled hearing to show cause why the investigative report has not been submitted. The circuit court's administrative order should schedule the hearing for a date not to exceed 45 days. The time interval may be substantially shortened if the court determines that the information in the family court's written referral presents reason to believe a child may be in imminent danger. Rule 3a(a), RPCANP; Rule 25a(a), RDVCP.

When CPS believes the circuit court of another county is a more appropriate venue for the administrative proceedings, it may file a motion to transfer the administrative proceedings to another county. Rule 3a(e), RPCANP; Rule 25a(f), RDVCP. Such a motion must be filed within ten days following the service of an administrative order directing CPS to conduct an investigation. The court should grant the motion unless it finds that the basis for the motion is clearly unreasonable under the circumstances. Any transfer of the administrative proceedings to another circuit court will not affect the forty-five day time period required by Rule 3a(e) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

Once the circuit court provides the circuit clerk the Administrative Order Directing Investigation and Report, a "JAA" number will be assigned and placed on the order (along with the family court case number from the case from which the written referral originated). The clerk should then fax or mail copies of the order to the prosecuting attorney, the county supervisor of the local CPS office, and the family court that made the written referral. Rule 3a(c). Because these administrative proceedings involve child abuse and neglect matters, the court file should be handled as confidential records similar to Chapter 49 cases. Likewise, hearings on these administrative orders are to be closed to the general public; except that any person whom the court determines to have a legitimate interest in the matter may attend. If the family court case that gave rise to the referral and order requiring investigation was a domestic violence case, involved staff from a domestic violence agency is entitled to attend administrative order hearings to the same extent of access to domestic violence hearings. Rule 3a(d).

These administrative proceedings will typically be short-lived cases. In most of these administrative cases, CPS will investigate and either file its investigative report with the circuit court or will file an abuse and neglect petition, thereby starting a new "JA" case. The filing of the investigative report or abuse and neglect petition will usually occur before the scheduled hearing date, but could occur at the hearing. If an abuse and neglect petition has been filed, or upon review of the investigative report the circuit court concludes that CPS is not under any obligation to file a petition, the court should file an Administrative Order of Closure to conclude the case.

C. Mandamus Proceedings Following the Filing of an Investigative Report

petition. Upon review of the Department's report and the written referral from family court, the circuit court may believe that the information reasonably suggests that CPS has a statutory obligation to file an abuse and neglect petition. Rule 3a(b), RPCANP; see also Rule 25a(b), RDVCP. In this instance, the court should issue a Mandamus Show Cause Order which treats the written referral from family court as a mandamus petition in the name of the child or children. By its terms, the mandamus show cause order closes the "JAA" case and opens a new mandamus proceeding, setting a prompt hearing on the question of whether the Department has a clear legal duty to file an abuse and neglect petition.

The Department's mandatory duty to file an abuse and neglect petition can arise in one of two ways. First, under the particular circumstances the Department may have a nondiscretionary duty to file a petition pursuant to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-4-605. Secondly, in other situations where the decision to file is within the Department's discretion, a duty to file can arise if the court finds "aggravated circumstances" and that the Department acted arbitrarily and capriciously in deciding not to file an abuse and neglect petition. Rule 3a(b). The term "aggravated circumstances" includes, but is not limited to, child abandonment or when a parent subjects a child to torture, chronic abuse or sexual abuse. W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(d)(1).

D. Contempt Proceedings Relating to Pre-Petition Investigations

The third (and least likely) path for an administrative case would be when CPS does not file an investigative report or abuse/neglect petition within the timeframe set in the administrative order. The circuit court should then issue a Contempt Show Cause Order Regarding Prior Order Directing Investigation and Report. The contempt matter would be addressed as part of the administrative case, with the same "JAA" case number. The administrative case would not be closed until the contempt issue is fully resolved.

Contempt proceedings could also arise in the course of a pre-petition mandamus case. If a circuit court issues an order determining that CPS has a mandatory duty to file an abuse/neglect petition and CPS does not do so, the court may issue a Contempt Show Cause Order for Failure to File an Abuse and Neglect Petition. These contempt proceedings would remain part of the mandamus case, and all orders and other filings should bear the same "JAM" number. The mandamus case would remain open until the contempt matter is fully resolved.

E. Removal of Family Court Minor Guardianship Cases to Circuit Court

Under West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, a petition seeking appointment of a guardian for a minor may be filed and heard in either family court or circuit court. If a minor guardianship petition is filed in family court and the judge learns that the basis of the petition, in whole or in part, is child abuse or neglect allegations, the family court must remove the case to circuit court. Rule 48a(a), Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court; Rule 13(a), Rules of Minor Guardianship Proceedings. If the allegations of abuse or neglect are apparent from the petition seeking guardianship, the family court may issue the removal order prior to any hearing. If the family court first becomes aware of allegations or information regarding possible abuse or neglect during a hearing, the family court may appoint a temporary guardian if necessary, but otherwise must continue the hearing and remove the case to circuit court for further hearing to be conducted within ten days.

Upon receiving the removal order from family court, the circuit clerk should immediately provide a copy to the circuit court. Rule 48a(a), Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court; Rule 13(a), Rules of Minor Guardianship Proceedings. Upon receiving the removal order, the circuit court must schedule a hearing to be conducted within ten days of the removal from family court, and see that CPS is given a notice of hearing and a copy of the petition. The petitioner and other parties must also be provided written notice of the circuit court hearing. Depending upon local practices or rules, the circuit clerk may be responsible for sending the notices to CPS and the parties. Once a case is removed to circuit court, the case or any portion of it may not be remanded to family court.

At the circuit court hearing on the guardianship petition, allegations of abuse and neglect must be sustained by clear and convincing evidence. If the court deems it necessary or appropriate, the administrative and mandamus proceedings under Rule 3a of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings relating to child maltreatment investigations may be utilized when addressing the matters raised by the guardianship petition. See Rule 48a(b), Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court; Rule 13(b), Rules of Minor Guardianship Proceedings. If Rule 3a proceedings are initiated by the court, the hearing on the guardianship petition would necessarily be continued. During the pendency of these matters, however, a temporary guardianship order may be needed in some cases to protect the child's safety and welfare.

If the Department files a child abuse and neglect petition as the result of the Rule 3a proceedings, the petitioner may be named as a co-petitioner, provided that the parties agree. Rule 3(b), Rules of Minor Guardianship Proceedings. However, Rule 3(b) expressly indicates that it should not be interpreted so as to require the guardianship petitioner to appear as a co-petitioner. In addition, Rule 3(b) indicates that a minor guardianship petitioner should not be foreclosed from filing an abuse and neglect petition even though the Department shows cause that it should not be required to file an abuse and neglect petition during the course of the Rule 3a proceedings.

If an abuse and neglect petition is filed, the circuit court in which such petition is pending may order the transfer of any other proceeding, except for a criminal or delinquency case, that arises from the same facts as the petition or addresses whether abuse or neglect occurred. The transfer provision applies to other cases pending in another circuit court, family court or magistrate court.

XI. INTERSTATE PLACEMENT PROCEEDINGS

The interstate placement of children is often fraught with delays that are difficult to address because cooperation between two states typically raises a number of jurisdictional and bureaucratic issues. However, through judicial leadership and the use of existing statutes and rules, the court can eliminate or diminish most of these delays. The court should also consider seeking the informal assistance of the courts in other states to ensure timely placement of children.

A. The Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children

West Virginia enacted the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (ICPC) in 1975 (W. Va. Code §§ 49-7-101, et seq.). The ICPC is designed to facilitate cooperation among states in the placement of children into homes and facilities across state boundaries. The stated purpose of the ICPC is to maximize opportunities to place children in appropriate settings, to facilitate clear communication between agencies in the sending and receiving states, and to ensure that appropriate arrangements for the care of children are made.

The compact is comprised of ten articles and ten regulations. The compact sets forth cooperative terms designed to facilitate the placement of a child across state borders. Article 1 emphasizes that each child requiring placement "shall receive the maximum opportunity to be placed in a suitable environment," and that the receiving states should have appropriate authority to assess the adequacy of potential placements within their borders. Article 2 defines terms, while Article 3 sets the conditions for placement and Article 4 prescribes penalties for illegal placements. Article 5 settles questions of jurisdiction, while Article 6 provides ground rules for placing delinquent children into out-of-state institutions. Article 7 defines the responsibilities of the state compact administrator, specifically to coordinate all activities under this compact. Articles 8, 9 and 10 focus on the limitations of the compact, mechanisms for adjusting the terms, and the means for enacting or terminating participation in the compact.

When a child is in the custody of the state, state officials may seek to place that child in the physical custody of a person or facility in another state. In order to make this request, the sending state needs to provide sufficient documentation for the receiving state to assess the appropriateness of the potential placement. Should the receiving state determine that the placement is inappropriate, the sending state may not place the child in that proposed placement. When the receiving state does deem the placement appropriate, the sending state retains legal jurisdiction over the case and the receiving state agrees to provide any necessary supervisory services. The compact indicates that there may be penalties for failing to abide by these terms, but these sanctions are vague and practically unenforceable.

The ICPC process initiates with a written request by a local sending agency (such as CPS) to make a placement of the child in a different state. The written request is part of an ICPC Packet that includes: (1) a standardized Interstate Compact Placement Request Form (ICPA 100A); (2) a cover letter delineating the details and circumstances of this case; (3) a medical/financial plan that addresses the child's material and health needs; and (4) all pertinent legal documents necessary to document custody and circumstances. The local agency sends the packet to the state office where it is reviewed for completeness and then forwarded to the corresponding state office in the receiving state. The receiving state office reviews the packet for completeness before forwarding it on to the appropriate local personnel where the placement has been requested. The ICPC procedure, as applied in child abuse and neglect cases, contains roughly eight processes:

1. The ICPC packet is prepared by the local agency in the sending state and forwards it to the state compact administrator;

2. Sending state compact administrator forwards the packet to receiving state administrator;

3. Receiving state administrator forwards the packet to appropriate local agency for action (typically a home study);

4. The local agency completes the request and prepares a report with a recommendation on the placement;

5. Receiving state administrator reviews the report and makes a determination to approve or deny the placement request;

6. The placement decision along with the report from the local agency is sent to the sending state administrator;

7. If the placement is denied, the process ends and other (concurrent) permanency plans need to be completed. If the placement is approved, the sending state must decide whether to utilize the placement within six months; and

8. Receiving state automatically closes the case if an approved placement is not made within six months of approval.

Delays can be encountered at the onset, for instance, in gathering the necessary documents (court orders, immunization records, Social Security cards, etc.). Then, the process may encounter delays in the second stage as the packet must be funneled through the sending state's centralized office. Third, the sending state forwards the referral to the receiving state's centralized office where it is processed. Only then is the referral sent on to the local child welfare agency where the sending state would like to make a placement.

Because there are numerous stages in which delays may occur in the interstate placement process, it should be kept in mind that the court is entitled to inquire, and should inquire, about the status of a case delayed in other state. The court's inquiry could include: informal communication with a presiding judge in the jurisdiction in which the placement is to occur (perhaps the local judge would assist in removing barriers to placement, such as a delayed home study); order the Department to make direct inquiry of their counterparts in the receiving state to ascertain the cause for delay and potential remedies; invoke the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (see below) and request the that a judge in the other jurisdiction conduct proceedings there to enforce compliance with ASFA timeframes and ICPC provisions and regulations. Judicial leadership by the court in the sending state to promote the expeditious completion of interstate placement of children is key to avoiding delays commonly encountered in the two-state process.

B. The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act

The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) (W. Va. Code §§ 48-20-101, et seq.) is designed to aid in the resolution of interstate jurisdictional disputes and to ensure cooperation between states in the handling of child custody cases. The UCCJEA has provisions that permit the taking of testimony in other states and, among other measures, authorizes West Virginia courts to request that courts of other states hold evidentiary hearings for West Virginia cases. West Virginia Code § 48-20-111(a) provides that "a party to a child custody proceeding may offer testimony of witnesses who are located in another state, including testimony of the parties and the child, by deposition or other means allowable in this state for testimony taken in another state." Subsection (b) of this statute specifies that testimony may be by telephone, audiovisual means, or other electronic means. Additionally, West Virginia Code § 48-20-112(a) allows West Virginia courts to request courts in another state to:

> (2) Order a person to produce or give evidence pursuant to procedures of that state;
>
> (3) Order that an evaluation be made with respect to the custody of a child involved in a pending proceeding;
> (4) Forward to the court of this state a certified copy of the transcript of the record of the hearing, the evidence otherwise presented and any evaluation prepared in compliance with the request; and
> (5) Order a party to a child custody proceeding or any person having physical custody of the child to appear in the proceeding with or without the child.

This provision could be used creatively by the court to compel the appearance of a non-cooperating agency representative in the receiving state to explain his or her actions, or lack thereof. For example, if the home study process is being delayed in the receiving state, a court of this state could ask the local court in the receiving state to conduct a proceeding to determine the cause for delay, and to compel the appearance of non-cooperating individuals. Likewise, a court of this state could request the court in the receiving state to compel witnesses in the receiving state to appear in the West Virginia proceeding via videoconferencing. The UCCJEA even permits a court to assess costs relating to out-of-state hearings (e.g., travel, videoconferencing expenses, etc.) against a party. (See W. Va. Code § 48-20-112(c)). Although the UCCJEA does not seem to be frequently used to ensure the timely interstate placement of children, the provisions of the act certainly authorize the court to reach across state lines to break through placement barriers.

C. Rules that Facilitate Interstate Participation in Abuse and Neglect Proceedings

Video conferencing (West Virginia Trial Court Rule 14.02).

Filing via FAX (West Virginia Trial Court Rule 12.04).

XII. TRANSITION PLANNING FOR OLDER YOUTH

In 2008, Congress passed the Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act ("Fostering Connections Act"). One of its significant purposes was to address problems faced by older youth in foster care as they transition into adulthood. May Shin, A Saving Grace? The Impact of the Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act on America's Older Foster Youth, 9 Hastings Race & Poverty L.J. 133 (2012). Specific issues faced by youth who turn 18 while in foster care include problems finding steady employment, obtaining education and life skills, managing finances, obtaining and keeping stable housing, avoiding incarceration, and supporting their physical and mental health. 9 Hastings Race & Poverty L.J. at 136. In an attempt to remedy these problems, the Fostering Connections Act amended various provisions of Title IV-E of the Social Security Act.

As an initial matter, 42 U.S.C. § 675(8)(B) was amended to allow states to provide financial support to youth who have reached the age of 18 but who have not reached age 21, so long as they are engaged in approved educational or employment activities or are incapable of doing so because of a medical condition. 42 U.S.C. § 675(8)(B). Also, youth who receive financial support are subject to the same case review requirements as other foster children. 42 U.S.C. § 675(5). Another provision requires states to assist youth with the development of a personalized transition plan 90 days before they turn 18. 42 U.S.C. § 675(5)(H). These provisions are designed to improve educational and employment outcomes for youth who turn 18 while they are in foster care.

West Virginia has adopted statutes and rules in order to implement these important provisions of the Fostering Connections Act. The Legislature has adopted the term "transitioning adult" for youth who have reached age 18 but who are under 21 years of age. W. Va. Code § 49-1-202. To meet the requirements of this provision, the youth must also have been adjudicated as an abused or neglected child or must have been in the Department's custody when he or she turned 18.[16] Further, the youth must need assistance with an educational, training or treatment program that was initiated before the youth's eighteenth birthday. Transitioning adults are subject to the same requirements for both permanency and review hearings as other foster children who are under 18. W. Va. Code § 49-4-110.

[16] In addition to children who are in the Department's custody because of an abuse and neglect case, the term, "transitioning adult," applies to youth who are in the Department's custody as a result of juvenile proceedings, including status offender cases. A youth meets the definition of the term so long as he or she was in the Department's custody when turning 18 -- the term is not limited to youth who were adjudicated as abused or neglected children. In subparagraph (A), the term expressly includes youths who committed a delinquent act before turning 18 and who require supervision and care to complete an education or treatment program initiated before turning 18. W. Va. Code § 49-1-202.

In order to promote a successful transition, a case plan is required to specify services that a child, aged 14 or older, should receive to assist with the transition to adulthood. Rule 28(b)(8). Once a child has turned 17 while in the Department's custody or as soon as a child who has reached age 17 is joined as a party to an abuse and neglect case, the Department must provide the child with support and assistance to develop a personalized transition plan. The time at which a transition plan must be established under Rule 28 is more stringent than the 90-day period before a youth's eighteenth birthday required by the Fostering Connections Act. Under Rule 28, the plan must include specific options for housing, health insurance, education, local opportunities for mentors, continuing support services, work force support and employment services. If a child has turned 17 and has special needs, the child is entitled to the appointment of an adult services worker to coordinate the activities of the MDT with other transition planning teams, such as an IEP team.

To assist with the transition to adulthood, the Department has implemented the Youth Transitioning Policy that requires caseworkers to complete certain steps once a child in foster care turns 14. The Casey Life Skills Assessment is a tool that is used to engage teenagers with the process of developing adult life skills. As a method to meet the requirements of the Fostering Connections Act, the Department has developed a "WV Older Youth Transition Plan." In addition to developing transition plans, caseworkers should make referrals to the MODIFY Program (formerly "Chafee Program"). Some additional steps in the Department's Youth Transitioning Policy include assisting youth with obtaining a credit report, assisting youth with applying for Social Security Disability when appropriate, addressing educational and career plans in an MDT, and scheduling medical, dental, optometric and mental health appointments before a child turns 18. These steps and others are more fully explained in the Youth Transitioning Policy.

I. CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT: GENERAL PRINCIPLES AND DEFINITIONS

A. Primary Goal in Abuse and Neglect Cases

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996); Syl. Pt. 3, In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997); Syl. Pt. 2, In re William John R., 200 W. Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.

In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993)

In any child welfare case, the best interests of the child are foremost in cases involving the termination of parental rights. All parental rights in child custody matters are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child.

In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997)

"Contrary to the assertion of James B., civil abuse and neglect proceedings focus directly upon the safety and well-being of the child and are not simply 'companion cases' to criminal prosecutions." 491 S.E.2d at 613.

B. When Criminal Investigations and Proceedings are Pending

Jennifer A. v. Burgess, No. 21009 (W. Va. Supreme Court unpublished order entered May 15, 1992)

Abuse and neglect proceedings should be instituted even though criminal investigations and proceedings are pending.

In re B.C., 233 W. Va. 130, 755 S.E.2d 664 (2014)

"[C]ivil abuse and neglect proceedings are to be treated as separate and apart from criminal proceedings arising from abuse and neglect." 755 S.E.2d at 673. The focus of an abuse and neglect case is the safety and well being of child.

C. Abused Child - Neglected Child Defined

Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S., 197 W. Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996) (per curiam); Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997)

W. Va. Code § 49-1-201

An "abused child" is defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, as a child who is harmed or threatened by "[a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" In addition, W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, defines a "neglected child" as a child who is harmed or threatened "by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian[.]"

Syl. Pt. 1, W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996); Syl. Pt. 4, In re Katelyn T., 225 W. Va. 264, 692 S.E.2d 307 (2010)

Implicit in the definition of an abused child under W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 is the child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent or guardian who fails to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator of abuse, rather choosing to remain silent.

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W. Va. 20, 459 S.E.2d 131 (1995); Syl. Pt. 1, In the Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Lilith H., 231 W. Va. 170, 744 S.E.2d 280 (2013)

W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.

W. Va. Code § 49-1-201

Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a).

In re Lilith H., 231 W. Va. 170, 744 S.E.2d 280 (2013)

In this case a physical altercation arose between two men -- the grandfather and the father of the children who were ultimately subject to the abuse and neglect petition. During the altercation, the children's mother intervened and struck the grandfather. The children also observed the altercation. Based on this single occurrence, the children were adjudicated as abused and neglected children. The father was adjudicated because he engaged in domestic violence, and the mother was adjudicated because she failed to protect her children. Reversing the circuit court, the Supreme Court found that the single occurrence of domestic violence and the fact that the children witnessed it was insufficient to establish abuse and neglect under the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a) that define an "abused child" as one whose parent "knowingly allows another person" to inflict physical, mental or emotional injury to the child.

D. Meaning of Term "Knowingly"

Syl. Pt. 7, W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996)

The term "knowingly" as used in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a)(1) does not require that a parent actually be present at the time the abuse occurs, but rather that the parent was presented with sufficient facts from which he/she could have and should have recognized that abuse has occurred.

E. "Imminent Danger" Defined

In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)

"Imminent danger" defined to include lack of cooperation to provide adequate food and shelter.

F. Parental Rights and Limitations

Syl. Pt. 1, In the Matter of Ronald Lee Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973); Syl. Pt. 6, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Carolyn Jean T., 181 W. Va. 383, 382 S.E.2d 577 (1989); Syl. Pt. 1, W. Va. DHS v. Tammy B., 180 W. Va. 295, 376 S.E.2d 309 (1988); Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988)

In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than the right of a natural parent to the custody or his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the W. Va. and U.S. Constitutions.

Syl. Pt. 5, In the Matter of Ronald Lee Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973); Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Jessica M., 191 W. Va. 302, 445 S.E.2d 243 (1994); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Carolyn Jean T., 181 W. Va. 383, 382 S.E.2d 577 (1989); Syl. Pt. 1, State v. C.N.S., 173 W. Va. 651, 319 S.E.2d 775 (1984)

Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with childcare.

G. Governing Rules and Procedures

1. Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code

Syl. Pt. 2, In the Matter of Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995)

W. Va. Code §§ 49-1-101, et seq.

The procedure in abuse and neglect cases is governed by provisions internal to W. Va. Code §§ 49-1-1, et seq., and such other procedural requirements of the Code or general law as obtain. Except for Rules 5(b), 5(e) and 80, the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure for Trial Courts of Record are not applicable to such cases.

2. Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings

In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001)

"The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and the related statutes detailing fair, prompt, and thorough procedures for child abuse and neglect cases are not mere general guidance; rather, they are stated in mandatory terms and vest carefully described and circumscribed discretion in our courts, intended to protect the due process rights of the parents as well as the rights of the innocent children." 558 S.E.2d at 621.

3. Rules of Evidence

In the Interest of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537, n. 6 (1989) (noting that it was not error for the Court to hear inadmissible evidence because a judge is "fully competent to disregard inadmissible evidence.")
Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981)

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c), requires the State Department of Welfare, in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i)

Syl. Pt. 8, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991)

Prior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court.

II. ROLE OF CIRCUIT COURT – GENERALLY

A. Jurisdiction

Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W. Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198, (1997); Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Rose L. v. Pancake, 209 W. Va. 188, 544 S.E.2d 403 (2001)

A circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain an abuse and neglect petition and to conduct proceedings in accordance therewith as provided by W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-1, et seq.

W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq.

B. Jurisdiction -- Interstate Custody Issues

W. Va. DHHR ex rel. Hisman v. Angela D., 203 W. Va. 335, 507 S.E.2d 698 (1998)

Based upon express language in the UCCJA, the Court recognized that the UCCJA (now titled UCCJEA and codified at W. Va. Code §§ 48-20-101, et seq.) applies to abuse and neglect proceedings.

In re Tyler D., 213 W. Va. 149, 578 S.E.2d 343 (2003) (per curiam)

After the circuit court reunified the respondent mother and children and dismissed the petition, the respondent mother moved to Maryland where the Allegheny County Department of Social Services obtained legal custody of the children based on alleged abuse and neglect. Although proceedings were ongoing in Maryland, the West Virginia DHHR and the guardian ad litem appealed the dismissal of the petition to the West Virginia Supreme Court.

On appeal, the Supreme Court recognized that the UCCJEA and the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act applied to abuse and neglect cases. Finding that Maryland was the proper forum to assume jurisdiction, the Supreme Court instructed the circuit court to inform the Maryland court of the West Virginia proceedings. Additionally, the Supreme Court reversed the dismissal of the West Virginia petition and addressed the remaining issues, so that the circuit court would have guidance for future proceedings if Maryland deferred jurisdiction to West Virginia.

C. Jurisdiction – Child Support

Note: For a more complete discussion of these cases, see Caselaw Digest Section VI. Child Support in Abuse and Neglect Cases. See also Special Procedures Section VII. See W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-801, et seq. for provisions governing child support.

Syl. Pt. 3, DHHR v. Smith, 218 W. Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (2005)

When a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child.

Syl. Pt. 4, In re J.L., 234 W. Va. 116, 763 S.E.2d 654 (2014)

Pursuant to Rule 6 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, when a circuit court enters an order awarding or modifying child support in an abuse and neglect case, the circuit court retains jurisdiction over such child support order.

Syl. Pt. 5, In re J.L., 234 W. Va. 116, 763 S.E.2d 654 (2014)

Pursuant to Rule 16a(d) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, a circuit court cannot transfer or remand a child support order that it has entered in an abuse and neglect case to the family court for enforcement or modification.

D. High Priority for Court's Attention

Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991); Syl. Pt. 6, W. Va. DHHR v. Scott C., 200 W. Va. 304, 489 S.E.2d 281 (1997); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); Syl. Pt. 5, In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); Syl. Pt. 3, Boarman v. Boarman, 190 W. Va. 533, 438 S.E.2d 876 (1993); Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources v. Pancake, 224 W. Va. 39, 680 S.E.2d 54 (2009); Syl. Pt. 4, In re Isaiah A., 228 W. Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010)

Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.

Syl. Pt. 5, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991); Syl. Pt. 6, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); Syl. Pt. 5, Boarman v. Boarman, 190 W. Va. 533, 438 S.E.2d 876 (1993); Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. W. Va. DHHR v. Pancake, 224 W. Va. 39, 680 S.E.2d 54 (2009)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(j)

The clear import of the statute [W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

E. Time Standards for Processing Abuse and Neglect Cases

Although the specific rules cited in this opinion have been abrogated, the admonition to follow lawful directives of the Legislature and Supreme Court is still applicable to the time standards presently in force. In this regard, the Supreme Court noted that:

> It is vital to the rule of law that legislative and appellate commands be honored. A judge is free, of course, to manage his or her own docket but, when such managerial decisions transgress appellate commands, it is incumbent upon the trial judge to avoid the further (and quite different) impression that he or she has crossed the line into disregard . . . A circuit court is not at liberty to disregard lawful directives of the Legislature and this Court simply because those directives conflict with the judge's individual notions of efficiency or docket control. In the last analysis, it is crucial to public confidence in the courts that judges be seen as enforcing the > law and as obeying it themselves. Exactly so. This is the short of it--and there is no long of it. 470 S.E.2d at 185.

State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996)

A delay of eight months in holding evidentiary hearing and of two months in making determination of neglect were in clear contravention of directive that matters involving abuse and neglect of children take precedence over almost every other matter and that abuse and neglect proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. S.C. v. Chafin, 191 W. Va. 184, 444 S.E.2d 62 (1994)

If the court adjudicates, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-2, that the child is abused or neglected, then both the DHHR and the court, no later than 60 days after the child is placed in the temporary custody of the DHHR, are to proceed with the disposition of the child in compliance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-5. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) requires the DHHR to file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including permanency plan for the child.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(a)

State ex rel. Tristen K. v. Janes, Memorandum Order, No. 35718 (W. Va. Supreme Court unpublished order entered November 17, 2010).

In this memorandum order that dismissed a petition for a writ of prohibition, the Court noted that:

> "[W]e remain troubled by the expanse of time involved in this case and feel compelled to remind the lower court of the time frames involved in abuse and neglect cases, as well as the priority that should be placed on such cases."

F. Continuances

In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)

"The sacred rights of the affected children" must be considered in deciding whether to grant a continuance.

In re Kyiah P., 213 W. Va. 424, 582 S.E.2d 871 (2003)

This case involved serious allegations of abuse and neglect, as well as the respondent's prior termination of parental rights in Virginia. Although the circuit court granted one continuance on DHHR's motion, it denied a second motion and dismissed the petition when DHHR failed to produce Virginia CPS witnesses who could testify concerning the Virginia proceedings. Reversing the dismissal, the Supreme Court reasoned that the best interests of the children required the court to conduct an adjudicatory hearing and that DHHR had established good cause for a continuance.

G. Appointment of Counsel

Note: For a complete discussion of the appointment of counsel for parents and custodians, including when a parent is a co-petitioner with the Department, see Overview Section IV. F.

Syl. Pt. 8, In the Matter of Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995); Syl. Pt. 2, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)

Circuit courts should appoint counsel for parents and custodians required to be named as respondents in abuse and neglect proceedings incident to the filing of each abuse and neglect petition. Upon the appearance of such persons before the court, evidence should be promptly taken, by affidavit and otherwise, to ascertain whether the parties for whom counsel has been appointed are or are not able to pay for counsel. In those cases in which the evidence rebuts the presumption of inability to pay as to one or more of the parents or custodians, the appointment of counsel for any such party should be promptly terminated upon the substitution of other counsel or the knowing, intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Counsel appointed in these circumstances are entitled to compensation as permitted by law.

H. Mandatory Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Cases

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001); Syl. Pt. 6, In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 617 S.E.2d 547 (2005); Syl. Pt. 5, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Darrien B., 231 W. Va. 25, 743 S.E.2d 333 (2013); Syl. Pt. 3, In re M.M., 236 W. Va. 108, 778 S.E.2d 338 (2015)

Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

An abuse and neglect case was initiated after a child was diagnosed with a spiral fracture. When the CPS worker went to the home to remove a second child, she observed extremely poor conditions. During the removal, the CPS worker also discovered that the father had voluntarily relinquished his rights to a daughter in an earlier abuse and neglect case that involved substantiated allegations of sexual abuse.

After an adjudicatory hearing, an improvement period was granted, and the primary issue of concern was the condition of the home. At the conclusion of the improvement period, the circuit court conducted a disposition hearing, but did not issue a decision as to whether parental rights would be terminated. Rather, it directed the Department to continue providing services. At a review hearing conducted three months later, the court stated that it was terminating parental rights, even though the caseworker was not requesting termination. In response, counsel for the respondent mother requested the opportunity to present the testimony of a service provider and the caseworker, but the court did not allow counsel to do so. One month later, the circuit court issued a written order terminating parental rights.

On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the lower court should have allowed the mother's counsel to present the testimony of the two witnesses and remanded the case. Additionally, the Court directed that the substantiated allegations of sexual abuse against the father must be explored and addressed upon remand.

In preparation for disposition, the DHHR filed a case plan in which it recommended an improvement period for the adult respondents. The GAL, however, objected to an improvement period. After counsel for the adult respondents indicated their willingness to proceed, the trial court conducted two evidentiary hearings. After the hearings, the court denied the adult respondents' motions for improvement periods and terminated their parental rights.

On appeal, the adult respondents argued that the required procedures for abuse and neglect cases had been substantially frustrated and relied upon In re Ashton M., 723 S.E.2d 409 (W. Va. 2012) and In re Edward B., 558 S.E.2d 620 (W. Va. 2001). The Court, however, distinguished the case from Ashton M. and Edward B. because counsel for the adult respondents were aware that the GAL might not agree to an improvement period and they had prepared for the evidentiary hearings. Secondly, the Court noted that the parties had full notice of the issues and the opportunity to present evidence. Third, the Court observed that counsel did not object to proceeding with the hearing. Further, the Court pointed out that the adult respondents did not contend that they had additional witnesses or evidence to present. Therefore, the Court held that disposition process had not been substantially frustrated.

I. Required Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

In the Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i)

Findings of fact and conclusions of law required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) must be more than a bare statement couched in the language of the statute.

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(5)

Where a trial court order terminating parental rights merely declares that there is no reasonable likelihood that a parent can eliminate the conditions of neglect, without explicitly stating factual findings in the order or on the record supporting such conclusion, and fails to state statutory findings required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) on the record or in the order, the order is inadequate. Likewise, where a trial court removes a child from the custody of an alleged neglectful parent and places exclusive custody in another individual, the court must adhere to the mandates of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5), and failure to include statutorily required findings in the order or on the record renders the order inadequate.

J. Advance Approval of Expert Fees

Note: For a discussion of the authority of the circuit court to set expert fees, see Special Procedures Section IV. B.

In re Chevie V., 226 W. Va. 363, 700 S.E.2d 815 (2010)

The question in this case, the responsibility for the payment of expert witness fees, arose when a respondent mother sought approval from the circuit court to hire an expert witness concerning marks on a child which were alleged to be caused by a lit cigarette. The mother requested approval for an expert because the DHHR planned to present expert testimony regarding the child's injuries. After the circuit court approved the request, the respondent mother hired an expert and the circuit court ordered that the expert would be paid by the Public Defender Corporation. After the expert provided services, the respondent mother's attorney sought reimbursement for the expert's fees. The circuit court ordered the DHHR to pay the fee and upheld its ruling when the DHHR later sought to modify the ruling. The DHHR then sought appellate relief from the order pursuant to Rule 54(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure.

As a starting point for its analysis, the Supreme Court reviewed an earlier opinion, Hewitt v. DHHR, 575 S.E.2d 308 (W. Va. 2002), that concluded that a circuit court has the ultimate authority to direct payment of expert witness fees in abuse and neglect cases. The Supreme Court did not accept the DHHR's position in Hewitt that it has exclusive authority for the payment of expert witness fees pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-7-33, a statute that allows the DHHR to pay for health care services at the Medicaid rate when such rates are available.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-108

As a basis for assigning payment responsibility to the DHHR, the circuit court had relied on West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 and Trial Court Rules 27.01 and 27.02, provisions that govern payment when a court appoints an expert. The Supreme Court, however, concluded that these rules and statute were not dispositive of the issue because the circuit court had not appointed the expert. Rather, it had simply approved the respondent mother's request to hire an expert witness who would present testimony on her behalf.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-603

As a basis to oppose responsibility for payment, the DHHR argued that the Public Defender Corporation was the responsible entity based upon West Virginia Code § 29-21-13a(e) and Trial Court Rule 35.05(b), provisions that require the Public Defender Corporation to pay expert witness fees in eligible proceedings. However, the Supreme Court held that these provisions were general and the more specific provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 were dispositive of the issue.

With regard to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33, the Court concluded that the statute allows the circuit court the discretion to require the DHHR to pay fees for an expert witness in an abuse and neglect or juvenile case. The Court noted that the statute states that the court "may" require the DHHR to pay for "professional services" that include "'evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony' by an expert witness." 700 S.E.2d at 824. Based upon this reasoning, the Court affirmed the circuit court's order that required the DHHR to pay the fees for the expert witness.

The Court, however, reversed the circuit court insofar as it required the DHHR to pay the expert witness fee according to the schedule established by the Public Defender Corporation. The Court concluded that the relevant statute (then codified at West Virginia Code § 49-7-33) established that the DHHR has the sole authority to set the fee schedule for professional services provided in abuse and neglect and juvenile cases. The Court remanded the case to the circuit court to allow the DHHR to establish the fee schedule for the payment of the expert. In two new syllabus points, the Court held that:

Syl. Pt. 5: Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33, a circuit court "may ... order the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services" incurred in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. Such "professional services" include, but are not limited to, "evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony" by an expert witness. W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-108

Syl. Pt. 6: When a circuit court orders the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services, including those provided by an expert witness, pursuant to the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33, the Department of Health and Human Resources shall be permitted to establish the fee schedule by which the professional will be paid "in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate [with] adjust[ments to] the schedule as appropriate." W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

Hewitt v. DHHR, 212 W. Va. 698, 575 S.E.2d 308 (2002)

Although West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 allows the DHHR to pay for health services and expert witnesses in juvenile and abuse and neglect cases at the Medicaid rate, if available, the Court has not held that the DHHR has the "exclusive authority" to set expert witness fees. Rather, the Court has found that "a circuit court still remains the ultimate authority for entry of all orders directing payment of expert witness fees in abuse and neglect cases." 575 S.E.2d at 313.

III. THE OVERLAP OF CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT IN FAMILY COURT AND CIRCUIT COURT

A. Judicial Officers' Duty to Report Suspected Child Abuse and Neglect

Syl. Pt. 6, John D.K. v. Polly A.S., 190 W. Va. 254, 438 S.E.2d 46 (1993)

Under W. Va. Code § 49-6A-2, it is mandatory for any circuit judge, family law master, or magistrate having reasonable cause to suspect abuse or neglect to immediately report the same to the Division of Human Services of the Department of Health and Human Resources.

Syl. Pt. 8, Katherine B.T. v. Jackson, 220 W. Va. 219, 640 S.E.2d 569 (2006)

When any circuit court judge, family court judge, or magistrate has reasonable cause to suspect that a child is neglected or abused, the circuit court judge, family court judge, or magistrate shall immediately report the suspected neglect or abuse to the state child protective services agency pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6A-2 and, if applicable, Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court.

W. Va. Code § 49-2-803(a)

B. Investigations Ordered by a Family Court Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301

State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources v. Ruckman, 223 W. Va. 368, 674 S.E.2d 229 (2009)

In an ongoing custody dispute, a father asked the family court to end the requirement of supervised visitation. There were no current allegations of child abuse or neglect; however, based on the history of the case, the family court decided not to alter the custodial arrangement without further investigation. The family court ordered DHHR, who was previously involved with the family, to conduct an investigation regarding the potential harm to the children should the visits be unsupervised; and further, ordered DHHR to supervise visitation between the father and the children while the investigation was pending.

DHHR sought a writ of prohibition in circuit court claiming the family court exceeded its authority by ordering DHHR to investigate when there were no current allegations of abuse or neglect, and by ordering DHHR to supervise the visits outside of a child abuse and neglect proceeding. The circuit court found that pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-301, the family court had the authority to order an investigation by DHHR. With regard to the second issue, the circuit court found that supervised visitation could not be ordered until the family court had a hearing and made the requisite findings of fact as commanded by Mary D. v. Watt, 438 S.E.2d 521 (W. Va. 1992). The circuit court did not, however, find that DHHR could not be ordered to supervise visitation in a domestic relations case if the requisite findings were made. DHHR appealed.

With regard to court ordered investigations pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-301, the West Virginia Supreme Court held:

Syl. Pt. 3: In a circumstance where mandatory reporting of abuse or neglect pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6A-2 and Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court is not implicated, a family court judge has discretion pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) to order an investigation to assess the potential of exposing a child to harm should a custodial decision such as ordering unsupervised visitation be made.

W. Va. Code § 49-2-803

Syl. Pt. 4: The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources falls within the classification in West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) of "professional social service organization experienced in counseling children and families" which in the course of a child custody proceeding a family or circuit court may order to conduct an investigation and report to the court.

However, the Supreme Court found that court ordered investigations by DHHR should not be a routine matter in family court, holding:

Syl. Pt. 5: Family court judges ordering an investigation pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) should make every effort to determine the best available options for obtaining the information needed in a timely manner in each case and should only resort to ordering DHHR to perform an investigation and report to the family court when extraordinary circumstances exist.

Factors bearing on whether DHHR, as opposed to another entity, should be ordered to conduct an investigation pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-501, include but are not necessarily limited to: DHHR's previous involvement and knowledge of the safety issues involved, the financial resources of the family, and the resources available in the lower court's circuit.

C. Proactive Role of Circuit Judges in Resolving Abuse and Neglect Cases

In re Skyelan H., 219 W. Va. 661, 639 S.E.2d 753 (2006)

The guardian ad litem moved the circuit court to stay its dismissal order based on new medical evidence that suggested three of the children in the respondent's care had been sexually abused. The circuit court denied the motion and the guardian ad litem appealed.

The Supreme Court reversed the dismissal order based on the evidence submitted by the parties during oral argument. The Court underscored the proactive role of circuit courts should take in resolving abuse and neglect cases when it stated:

> We are, however, troubled by the additional evidence submitted into the record after the circuit court's decision. After entry of the court's dismissal order, the guardian ad litem proffered to the court evidence suggesting that three of the children may have been victims of sexual abuse. While the evidence, standing alone, proves nothing, the circuit court should have taken a more proactive role in compelling a further investigation of the evidence. In other words, we > believe that the circuit court was empowered to demand that the DHHR investigate and report to the circuit court whether the evidence could or should be the basis of further action to protect the interest of the children. See, e.g., Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, Rule 3a; Rules of Practice and Procedure for Domestic Violence Civil Proceedings, Rule 25a. 639 S.E.2d at 755. (emphasis in original).

Similar to its analysis in Skyelan H., the Supreme Court emphasized the proactive role of judges in promptly and fairly resolving child abuse or neglect cases. Recognizing the important role of judges, the Court relied upon the procedural rules which are commonly referred to as the "overlap" rules. In a new syllabus point, the Court held that:

Syl. Pt. 5: To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations.

D. Minor Guardianship Proceedings

Syl. Pt. 7, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008)

Rule 48a(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court requires that if a family court presiding over a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 learns that the basis for the petition, in whole or in part, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court is required to remove the petition to circuit court for a hearing thereon. Furthermore, "[a]t the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence." West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court 48a(a).

W. Va. Code § 49-1-201

E. Collateral Estoppel/Res Judicata

Syl. Pt. 6, In re B.C., 233 W. Va. 130, 755 S.E.2d 664 (2014)

A petition for a domestic violence protective order under W.Va. Code § 48-27-101, et seq., and a petition alleging abuse and/or neglect under W.Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq., may be filed upon the same facts without consequences under the doctrine of res judicata or the doctrine of collateral estoppel.

W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq.

As an initial method to address allegations of abuse, a mother filed a domestic violence petition on her child's behalf against the father. At a final hearing, the family court denied the domestic violence protective order. After the circuit court affirmed the family court ruling, the mother filed an abuse and neglect case against the father based on similar allegations.

While the abuse and neglect case was pending, the father grabbed the child during an exchange and fractured the child's wrist. The mother sought and received a domestic violence protective order on her son's behalf. In response to the incident, the DHHR also moved to intervene in the abuse and neglect case to provide supportive services to the family. Approximately one month later, the mother amended the abuse and neglect petition to include the incident involving the fracture of the child's arm. Misdemeanor criminal charges were also initiated against the father.

The father's attorney moved to dismiss both the original and amended abuse and neglect petitions, on the basis of res judicata and/or collateral estoppel. The circuit court agreed with this argument and dismissed the abuse and neglect case.

On appeal, the Supreme Court found that, although a reputable person may file an abuse and neglect petition, the real party in interest in an abuse and neglect case is the State of West Virginia through the DHHR. In domestic violence cases, the Court found that the party in interest may be one of the following: "(1) a person individually seeking relief from domestic violence; (2) an adult person seeking relief from domestic violence on behalf of a family or household member, such as a minor child; or (3) a person who is being abused, threatened or harassed because they witnessed or reported domestic violence." 755 S.E.2d at 672. Since the real party in interest in each type of case is different from the other, the Court held that a domestic violence petition and/or abuse and neglect petition based on the same set of facts would not implicate the doctrines of collateral estoppel or res judicata.

As an additional basis for reversal, the Supreme Court discussed the difference in the types of remedies available in each type of proceeding. The Court observed that: "A domestic violence action is intended solely as a short-term, temporary response to domestic violence; an abuse and neglect action is designed to craft long-term solutions to both violence and neglect in the household." 755 S.E.2d at 673. Finally, the Court found that the circuit court erred in finding that the mother had the opportunity to litigate her allegations in the criminal case. The Court, therefore, reversed and remanded the case for further proceedings.

IV. PARTIES TO AN ABUSE AND NEGLECT PETITION

A. Who May File an Abuse and Neglect Petition

Note: Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code and Rule 17(a) indicate that an individual, upon the mutual consent of the parties, may serve as a co-petitioner with the DHHR. See Overview Section IV.

State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W. Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198 (1997)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(a)

Not only the DHHR has "standing" to file an abuse/neglect petition, any "reputable person" with knowledge of the facts may. W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a).

In re Emily G., 224 W. Va. 390, 686 S.E.2d 41 (2009)

When an abuse and neglect petition was brought by a child's grandparents and was dismissed without a hearing, the Supreme Court held that West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 requires the Department to participate in abuse and neglect proceedings and to provide supportive services to remedy the circumstances of abuse and neglect. Upon remand, the Department was to be joined as an intervenor.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601

Syl. Pt. 2, in part, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000); Syl. Pt. 4, In re Emily G., 224 W. Va. 390, 686 S.E.2d 41 (2009)

"[T]he Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights . . .."

Syl. Pt. 5, In re B.C., 233 W. Va. 130, 755 S.E.2d 664 (2014)

While a civil abuse and neglect action pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 [2005] may be initiated by either the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources or "a reputable person," the action is pursued solely on behalf of the State of West Virginia in its role as parens patriae.

This case involved a situation in which a mother initially filed a domestic violence petition against the child's father on the child's behalf that was ultimately denied by the family court. After the circuit court affirmed the dismissal, the mother filed an abuse and neglect petition against the father. While the abuse and neglect case was pending, the father grabbed the child and fractured the child's wrist at an exchange required by the parenting plan. In response, the mother filed a second domestic violence petition which was granted by the family court.

Discussing West Virginia Code § 49-6-1, the Court found that, although an abuse and neglect petition may be filed by a reputable person, "An abuse and neglect petition is prosecuted on behalf of one party, and only one party: the State of West Virginia, in its role as parens patriae." 755 S.E.2d at 671. The Court explained that the Legislature has designated the DHHR as the State's representative to prosecute child abuse and neglect petitions. The Court also observed that the ability to file an abuse and neglect does not indicate that the "reputable person" would necessarily have an interest in the proceeding or that the case was pursued on behalf of the reputable person. This reasoning, in turn, was the Court's basis for holding that res judicata or collateral estoppel would not bar abuse and neglect cases and domestic violence petitions based upon the same set of facts.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601

B. Custodian or Parent

Syl. Pt. 4, W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996)

Child abuse encompasses a parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly allows another person to inflict physical injury upon another child residing in the same home as the parent and his/her children, even though that child is not parent's natural or adopted child.

C. Non-Custodial Parents Can Be Found Abusive and/or Neglectful

Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Christine Tiara W., 198 W. Va. 266, 479 S.E.2d 927 (1996)

When the Department of Health and Human Services finds a situation in which apparently one parent has abused or neglected the children and the other has abandoned the children, both allegations should be included in the abuse and neglect petition filed under W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a). Every effort should be made to comply with the notice requirements for both parents. To the extent that State ex rel. McCartney v. Nuzum, 161 W. Va. 740, 248 S.E.2d 318 (1978), holds that a non-custodial parent can be found not to have abused and neglected his or her child it is expressly overruled.

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); Syl. Pt. 8, In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995)

When the DHHR seeks to terminate parental rights where an absent parent has abandoned the child, allegations of such abandonment should be included in the petition and every effort made to comply with the notice requirements of W. Va. Code § 49-6-1.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601

D. Foster Parents in Abuse and Neglect Cases

1. Foster Parents' Participation - Subject to the Court's Discretion

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996)

The foster parents' involvement in abuse and neglect proceedings should be separate and distinct from the fact finding portion of the termination proceeding and should be structured for the purpose of providing the circuit court with all pertinent information regarding the child. The level and type of participation in such cases is left to the sound discretion of the circuit court with due consideration of the length of time the child has been cared for by the foster parents and the relationship that has developed. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W. Va. 184, 324 S.E.2d 145 (1984), that decision is hereby modified.

2. Foster Parents' Participation in Permanency Hearing

After a young child had been continuously placed in a foster home for 22 months and all parental rights had been terminated, the DHHR sought and obtained an order to move the child to the home of a paternal aunt. The DHHR based this custody change upon its adoption policy that mandated placement with a blood relative over persons unrelated to a child. The foster parents attempted to attend the permanency hearing and present a motion to intervene, but were instructed to leave.

Finding that the circuit court exceeded its legitimate powers and issuing a writ of prohibition, the Supreme Court pointed out that the statute governing permanency hearings grants the right to notice and an opportunity to be heard to foster parents, pre-adoptive parents and relatives who are providing care to a child. Additionally, the Supreme Court noted that the circuit court erred because the foster parents had not even been considered as a permanent placement even though the child had lived with them for 22 months and they were not even allowed to present evidence concerning the child's best interests. Further, the Supreme Court pointed out that the DHHR should have developed a concurrent permanency plan for the child and could have considered the aunt as a possible placement at the beginning of the case.

3. Former Foster Parents

Syl. Pt. 4: Former foster parents do not have standing to intervene in abuse and neglect proceedings involving their former foster children.

Syl. Pt. 5: A circuit court may, in its sound discretion, permit former foster parents to present evidence regarding their former foster children to assist the court in assessing the best interests of such children subject to an abuse and neglect proceeding.

In any event, we do want to emphasize that, while the [former foster parents] do not have a right of intervention in the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings, they may not be completely devoid of remedies should they desire to pursue this matter further. Such alternative remedies at their disposal may include the extraordinary remedies of mandamus, as alluded to in the circuit court's order, and habeas corpus. . . . As both of these proceedings would be external to the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings, there exists a lesser likelihood of unnecessary and disruptive procedural delay. 525 S.E.2d at 324.

4. Right to Appeal

In re Harley C., 203 W. Va. 594, 509 S.E.2d 875 (1998)

Foster parents who are granted standing to intervene in abuse and neglect proceedings by the circuit court are parties to the action who have the right to appeal adverse circuit court decisions.

E. Abuse and Neglect Proceedings Not Applicable to School Teachers

W. Va. DHS v. Boley, 178 W. Va. 179, 358 S.E.2d 438 (1987)

Statutory provisions relating to child abuse and neglect are not applicable to remove or discipline a teacher who allegedly abused student; removal or disciplinary procedures are properly accomplished under provisions of teacher disciplinary statute.

V. CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT PETITION

A. Emergency Custody

Syl. Pt. 1, In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-602

W. Va. Code § 49-6-3, authorizes, upon the filing of a petition, the immediate, temporary taking of custody of a child by the Department of Human Services when there exists an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and there are no reasonably available alternatives to the removal of the child.

B. Allegations of Abandonment

When the DHHS finds a situation in which apparently one parent has abused or neglected the children and the other has abandoned the children, both allegations should be included in the abuse and neglect petition filed under W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a). Every effort should be made to comply with the notice requirements for both parents. To the extent that State ex rel. McCartney v. Nuzum, 161 W. Va. 740, 248 S.E.2d 318 (1978) holds that a noncustodial parent can be found not to have abused and neglected his or her child it is expressly overruled.

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); Syl. Pt. 8, In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995)

When the DHHR seeks to terminate parental rights where an absent parent has abandoned the child, allegations of such abandonment should be included in the petition and every effort made to comply with the notice requirements of W. Va. Code § 49-6-1.

C. Plea Bargain - No Dismissal of Petition

Syl. Pt. 2, In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997); Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. Lowe v. Knight, 209 W. Va. 134, 544 S.E.2d 61 (2000)

A civil child abuse and neglect petition instituted by the DHHR pursuant to W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-1, et seq., is not subject to dismissal pursuant to the terms of a plea bargain between a county prosecutor and a criminal defendant in a related child abuse prosecution.

W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq.

D. Duty to File Petition - Prior Termination Involving Sibling

Syl. Pt. 1, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000); Syl. Pt. 1, In re James G., 211 W. Va. 339, 566 S.E.2d 226 (2002)

When the parental rights of a parent to a child have been involuntarily terminated, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a petition, to join in a petition, or to otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding, to terminate parental rights as to any siblings of that child.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-605(a)(3)

Syl. Pt. 2, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000); Syl. Pt. 2, In re James G., 211 W. Va. 339, 566 S.E.2d 226 (2002)

While the Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to file, join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights in the circumstances listed in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3), the Department must still comply with the evidentiary standards established by the Legislature in W. Va. Code § 49-6-2 before a court may terminate parental rights to a child, and must comply with the evidentiary standards established in W. Va. Code § 49-6-3 before a court may grant the Department the authority to take emergency, temporary custody of a child.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601

W. Va. Code § 49-4-602

E. Non-Emergency Abuse and Neglect Petition

State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S., 197 W. Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996)

The Court noted that "West Virginia Code 49-6-1(a) provides the appropriate procedures for resolving non-emergency abuse or neglect situations . . .."

F. Amendments to Petition

Note: Rule 19 provides additional guidance concerning the amendment of petitions.

State v. Julie G., 201 W. Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997)

After a lengthy pre-adjudicatory improvement period, the circuit court found that the child did not meet the definition of an abused and neglected child as established by West Virginia Code § 49-1-3. In making this finding, the circuit court disregarded evidence that was discovered during the pre-adjudicatory improvement period because such evidence did not relate back to conditions that existed at the time the petition was filed. Reversing the circuit court, the Supreme Court explained that the petition should have been amended so that the circuit court could have properly considered evidence that was discovered after the original petition was filed. Clarifying the procedure for proper consideration of such evidence, the Court held that:

W. Va. Code § 49-1-201

Syl. Pt. 2, in part: Evidence regarding a parent's pre-adjudication improvement period may not be used to informally amend a previously-filed petition. The proper method of presenting new allegations to the circuit court is by requesting permission to file an amended petition pursuant to Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

Providing further guidance concerning the procedure for amending a child abuse and neglect petition, the Court held that:

Syl. Pt. 4: Under Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, amendments to an abuse/neglect petition may be allowed at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing begins. When modification of an abuse/neglect petition is sought, the circuit court should grant such petition absent a showing that the adverse party will not be permitted sufficient time to respond to the amendment, consistent with the intent underlying Rule 19 to permit liberal amendment of abuse/neglect petitions.

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Randy H., 220 W. Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006); Syl. Pt. 6, In re Lilith H., 231 W. Va. 170, 744 S.E.2d 280 (2013)

To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations.

The DHHR filed a child abuse and neglect petition after two children, ages four and six, were hospitalized because their eight-year-old sister gave them prescription medication. The person watching the children when this incident occurred was a registered sex offender. Hospital personnel noted that the children had a lice infestation, that the six-year old girl had a yeast infection, had bruising on her inner thigh, and acted as if she had been sexually abused. They also noted that the sex offender was acting affectionately towards the oldest child, a sixteen-year-old girl, in the waiting area.

During the course of the proceedings, the respondent mother corrected certain physical conditions in the residence. However, it became apparent the respondent mother associated with two other sex offenders. Although this information was known to the DHHR, it did not present any evidence on these issues. Ultimately, counsel for the respondent requested dismissal of the case, and the DHHR agreed. Over the objections of the guardians ad litem, the circuit court dismissed the petition.

Finding that the circuit court should have taken a more proactive role regarding this evidence, the Court stated that: "[T]he circuit court had the authority to compel the DHHR to further investigate these allegations and had a duty to make findings of fact and conclusions of law regarding those allegations." 640 S.E.2d at 190. Concerning the additional evidence that was not included in the allegations of the original petition, the Court held that a circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend a petition to encompass additional allegations of abuse or neglect.

Although this case involved two unmarried parents who resided together, the record was developed primarily with regard to the mother. After the mother's improvement period was terminated, the guardian ad litem requested that the petition be amended to include allegations regarding the father. The circuit court denied the motion and ordered the parties to develop a plan to reunify the child with her father.

On appeal, the Court found that the record concerning the father's parenting skills had not been sufficiently developed. The Court further noted that the record contained sufficient evidence to conclude that additional abuse or neglect by the father would be imminent, but the allegations were not encompassed in the original petition. Based upon these conclusions, the Court held that the circuit court erred when it denied the guardian ad litem's motion to amend the petition.

The DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition after a father and grandfather engaged in a physical altercation that was witnessed by the minor children. The mother also intervened and struck the grandfather. Although a police officer and a caseworker observed the extremely poor conditions in the home, the petition was never amended to include these allegations. After the initial adjudicatory hearing, the guardian ad litem requested that the petition be amended. The circuit court incorrectly ruled that the petition could not be amended because the adjudicatory hearing had already been conducted. In spite of this ruling, the parties agreed that the condition of the home could be considered at disposition.

On appeal, the Supreme Court held that it was plain error when the circuit court terminated parental rights based upon allegations and issues which had never been the subject of adjudication. In addition, the Court noted that it was troubled that the record was devoid of any reference to the condition of the home and the proper care and treatment of the children, even though the caseworker had testified at the preliminary hearing that these issues were serious enough to include in the petition. The Court found that the failure to amend the petition, along with insufficient evidence at adjudication and disposition, constituted reversible error.

VI. CHILD SUPPORT IN ABUSE AND NEGLECT CASES

A. Jurisdiction for Child Support in Abuse and Neglect Cases

DHHR v. Smith, 218 W. Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (2005); See also Syl. Pt. 3, In re Ryan B., 224 W. Va. 461, 686 S.E.2d 601 (2009)

Note: Rule 16a incorporated the holding of Smith in the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. In addition, West Virginia Code §§ 49-4-801, et seq. has established procedures governing child support in abuse and neglect cases.

In this case involving certified questions concerning child support in abuse and neglect cases, the West Virginia Supreme Court held that a circuit court, not a family court, has jurisdiction to set child support in a child abuse and neglect case or other proceeding brought pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, most typically juvenile status offense or delinquency cases. It further held that the entry of a support order is mandatory when an order is entered that alters the custodial responsibility for a child or commits the child to the custody of DHHR. In Smith, the Court expressly recognized that altering custodial responsibility may include transferring custody to one parent or placing the child in the custody of a third party, such as a relative. Finally, the Court held that the child support guidelines set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 48-13-101, et seq. apply to child support obligations in child abuse and neglect cases.

Syl. Pt. 3: When a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child.

Syl. Pt. 4: When a circuit judge enters an order on an abuse or neglect petition filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, and in so doing alters the custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child and/or commits the child to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources, W. Va. Code § 49-7-5 requires the circuit judge to impose a support obligation upon one or both parents for the support, maintenance and education of the child. The entry of an order establishing a support obligation is mandatory; it is not optional.

W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-801, et seq.

Syl. Pt. 5: Any order establishing a child support obligation in an abuse or neglect action filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia

Code must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code §§ 48-13-101, et seq.

B. Modification or Enforcement of Child Support in Abuse and Neglect Cases

Syl. Pt. 5, In re J.L., 234 W. Va. 116, 763 S.E.2d 654 (2014)

Pursuant to Rule 16a(d) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, a circuit court cannot transfer or remand a child support order that it has entered in an abuse and neglect case to the family court for enforcement or modification.

The parents of a child were divorced in 2005, and custody of the child was placed with the mother. The father was required to pay child support, but substantial arrearages accrued ($13,130.53). In response, the BCSE initiated contempt proceedings in family court in 2011. While the contempt proceedings were pending, the DHHR initiated a child abuse and neglect petition based on allegations that the father had committed domestic violence in the child's presence and that the mother had failed to shield the child from it. In turn, the family court dismissed the contempt proceedings because it determined that Rule 6[17] of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings prohibited it from addressing the child support contempt petition.

At the conclusion of the abuse and neglect case, the circuit court terminated the father's parental rights, modified his child support obligation and reduced payments on the arrearage to $50 per month. When the father again fell behind on his support obligation, the mother, pro se, filed a contempt petition in the abuse and neglect case. The circuit court found the father to be in contempt, issued a capias and remanded the case to family court for enforcement of the support order entered by the circuit court. In response, the BCSE appealed the remand of the case to family court.

On appeal, the Supreme Court first observed that family courts are courts of limited jurisdiction, while circuit courts are courts of general

[17] The relevant part of Rule 6 states as follows: "The court retains exclusive jurisdiction over placement of the child while the case is pending, as well as over any subsequent requests for modification, including, but not limited to, changes in permanent placement or visitation, except that (1) if the petition is dismissed for failure to state a claim under Chapter 49 of the W. Va. Code, or (2) if the petition is dismissed, and the child is thereby ordered placed in the legal and physical custody of both of his/her cohabitating parents without any visitation or child support provisions, then any future child custody, visitation, and/or child support proceedings between the parents may be brought in family court."

jurisdiction. The Court also noted that circuit courts have exclusive jurisdiction over child abuse and neglect cases, and that this jurisdiction includes the authority to decide child support issues. The Court went on to find that the establishment of child support is an integral part of an abuse and neglect case. The Court further recognized that, under Rule 6, the circuit court has continuing exclusive jurisdiction over matters, i.e. visitation or support, that might ordinarily lie within the jurisdiction of family court. The Court finally stated that Rule 16a(d) makes it "patently clear" that the circuit court could not transfer abuse and neglect matters to family court. Accordingly, the Supreme Court adopted Syllabus Point 5 in which it held that enforcement or modification of a circuit court child support order in an abuse and neglect case must be addressed by the circuit court and may not be remanded to family court.

C. Child Support Following a Termination or Voluntary Relinquishment of Parental Rights

The circuit court terminated the respondent father's parental rights, but required him to continue paying child support. On appeal, the respondent father argued that the child support requirement was fundamentally unfair because he could not visit his son. Rejecting this argument, the Court reasoned that W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) allowed the circuit court to terminate parental rights and/or responsibilities. Finding that child support is a parental responsibility, the Court held:

See also W. Va. Code § 49-4-802(d)

Syl. Pt. 7: Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), a circuit court may enter a dispositional order in an abuse and neglect case that simultaneously terminates a parent's parental rights while also requiring said parent to continue paying child support for the child(ren) subject thereto.

As further grounds to challenge the decision, the respondent father argued that the support obligation would be inequitable if the child were later adopted. Addressing this concern, the Court held that:

Syl. Pt. 8: A circuit court may, in the course of modifying a previously-entered dispositional order in an abuse and neglect case in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, amend a parent's continuing child support obligation or the amount thereof. The court may not, however, modify said dispositional order to cancel accrued child support or decretal judgments resulting from child support arrearages.

In re Ryan B., 224 W. Va. 461, 686 S.E.2d 601 (2009)

In these consolidated appeals, the Supreme Court addressed whether a parent who voluntarily relinquishes his or her parental rights can be required to make child support payments after his or her rights are permanently severed. The Court also addressed whether the imposition of a child support obligation is mandatory under West Virginia Code § 49-7-5 when a circuit court enters an order accepting a voluntary relinquishment or involuntarily terminating a parent's rights. With regard to the first issue, the parents whose rights were terminated argued that the Legislature's modification of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) overruled In re Stephen Tyler R. and consequently, precluded a circuit court from ordering a parent to pay child support after his or her rights are terminated. The Supreme Court held:

See W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-801, et seq.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)

Syl. Pt. 1: The Legislature's 2006 amendment of W. Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), changing the statute's "guardianship rights and/or responsibilities" language to "guardianship rights and responsibilities" was not intended to relieve parents who have their parental rights terminated in an abuse and neglect proceeding from providing their child(ren) with child support.

Syl. Pt. 2: A circuit court terminating a parent's parental rights pursuant to W. Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), must ordinarily require that the terminated parent continue paying child support for the child, pursuant to the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code, § 48-13-101, et. seq. If the circuit court finds, in a rare instance, that it is not in the child's best interest to order the parent to pay child support pursuant to the Guidelines in a specific case, it may disregard the Guidelines to accommodate the needs of the child if the court makes that finding on the record and explains its reasons for deviating from the Guidelines pursuant to W. Va. Code, § 48-13-702.

VII. PRELIMINARY HEARING

A. Notice Requirements

n. 18, In the Matter of George Glen B., Jr., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999)

The Court noted that Rule 20 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides for actual notice of at least five days prior to the preliminary hearing.

B. Time Standard for Preliminary Hearing

n. 20, In the Matter of George Glen B., Jr., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999)

The Court noted that Rule 22 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides that a preliminary hearing on emergency custody shall be conducted within 10 days after the continuation or transfer of custody is ordered as provided by W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a).

W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(b)

C. Prima Facie Case

State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S., 197 W. Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996) (per curiam)

As an initial matter, the Court noted that "West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(a) gives a court the authority to order a grant of temporary custody only 'if it finds that: (1) there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child; and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to the removal of the child . . .. '" 475 S.E.2d at 552. The Court observed that this case was more like a custody dispute between a mother and a grandmother, rather than a typical abuse and neglect case. The Court held that the circuit court was clearly wrong in granting emergency custody to the grandmother because the petition did not allege imminent danger. Rather, the allegations only involved the mother's failure to contribute financially to the child's care.

VIII. RIGHT TO COUNSEL/DUTIES AND ROLES

Appendix A, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993)

Note: Adopted in 2014, Appendix A to the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings includes the Guidelines for Children's Guardian Ad Litem in Child Abuse and Neglect Cases. These Guidelines were based substantially upon Appendix A of In re Jeffrey R.L.

GUIDELINES FOR GUARDIANS AD LITEM IN ABUSE AND NEGLECT CASES

Initial Stages of Representation

1. Notify promptly the child and any caretaker of the child of the appointment of counsel and the means by which counsel can be contacted.

2. Contact the caseworker and review the caseworker's file and all relevant information.

3. Contact and interview persons such as older children, caseworkers, and caretakers who may have information with respect to the child and obtain names and addresses of hospital personnel, physicians, teachers, law enforcement, and other persons who may have pertinent information regarding the child and interview them.

4. Absent extraordinary circumstances and the child is three or under:

a. If the child is in the care of someone other than the respondent(s), conduct interviews with the child's caretakers concerning the type of services the child is now receiving and the type of services the child needs and visit the child in the caretaker's home, making observations of the child or

b. If the child is in the care of the respondent(s), request from the respondent(s)' attorney interviews with the respondent(s) concerning the child's care and the type of services the child needs and visit the child in his/her home, making observations of the child. If refused, ask for assistance of the court.

5. Absent extraordinary circumstances and the client is over three:

a. If the child is in the care of someone other than respondent(s), conduct interviews with the child's caretakers concerning the type of services the child is now receiving and the type of services the child needs.

b. If the child is in the care of someone other than the respondent(s), conduct interviews with the child in a manner and environment appropriate to the child's age and maturity to obtain facts concerning the alleged abuse or neglect and to determine the child's wishes and needs regarding temporary visitation and/or placement.

c. If the child is in the care of the respondent(s), request from the respondent(s)' attorney interviews with the child out of the presence of the respondent(s) in a manner and environment appropriate to the child's age and maturity. It is essential that the guardian ad litem understand that the interview is for the purpose of gathering information not influencing information. If refused, ask the assistance of the court.

6. Provide to the child, his or her parents, and any caretaker notice of the petition and all subsequent motions.

7. Maintain contact with the child throughout the case and assure that s/he is receiving counseling, tutoring, or any other services needed to provide as much stability and continuity as possible under the circumstances.

Preparation for and Representation at Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing

8. Pursue the discovery of evidence, formal and informal.

9. File timely and appropriate written motions such as motions for status conference, prompt hearing, evidentiary purpose, psychological examination, home study, and development and neurological study.

10. Evaluate any available improvement periods and actively assist in the formulation of an improvement period, where appropriate, and service plans.

11. Monitor the status of the child and progress of the parent(s) in satisfying the conditions of the improvement period by requiring monthly updates or status reports from agencies involved with the family.

12. Participate in any discussions regarding the proposed testimony of the child and, if it is determined that the child's testimony is necessary, strongly advocate for the testimony to be taken in a legally acceptable and emotionally neutral setting.

13. Maintain adequate records of documents filed in the case and of conversations with the client and potential witnesses.

14. Ensure that the child is not exposed to excessive interviews with the potential dangers inherent therein. Before multiple physical or psychological examinations are conducted, the requesting party must present to the judge evidence of a compelling need or reason considering: (1) the nature of the examination requested and the intrusiveness; (2) the victim's age; (3) the resulting physical and/or emotional effects of the examination on the victim; (4) the probative value of the examination to the issue before the court; (5) the remoteness in time of the examination; and (6) the evidence already available for the defendant's use.

15. Ensure that a child who is court ordered to be interviewed by a psychologist or psychiatrist is interviewed in the presence of the guardian ad litem attorney unless the court, after consulting the child's guardian ad litem, believes that the interview is best conducted without the guardian ad litem.

16. Subpoena witnesses for hearings or otherwise prepare testimony or cross-examination of witnesses and ensure that relevant material is introduced.

17. Review any predispositional report prepared for the court prior to the dispositional hearing and be prepared to submit another if the report is not consistent with all other appropriate evidence.

18. Apprise the court of the child's wishes.

19. Explain to the child, in terms the child can understand, the disposition.

20. Advocate a gradual transition period, in a manner intended to foster emotional adjustment whenever a child is to be removed from the custody of anyone with whom s/he has formed an important attachment.

21. Ensure that the court considers whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests and an appropriate order is entitled to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

22. Ensure that the dispositional order contains provisions that direct the child protective agency to provide periodic reviews and reports.

Post-Dispositional Representation

23. Inform the child of his/her right to appeal.

24. Exercise the appellate rights of the child, if under the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary.

25. File a motion for modification of the dispositional order if a change of circumstances occurs for the child which warrants a modification or represent the child if said motion for modification is filed by any other party.

26. Continue to represent the child until such time as the child is adopted, placed in a permanent home, or the case is dismissed after an improvement period.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f)

Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a) mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the W. Va. Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the W. Va. Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client.

In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 617 S.E.2d 547 (2005)

This per curiam opinion involved two successive abuse and neglect petitions in which it was alleged that the adult respondent sexually abused his stepdaughter. Since the stepdaughter turned eighteen during the appeal, the opinion primarily addressed the effect of the proceedings on two younger children. The circuit court dismissed the first petition because of contradictory testimony between two witnesses. After the stepdaughter reported another incident of sexual abuse, a second petition was filed. The circuit court conducted an abbreviated hearing on the second petition and denied the guardian ad litem's motion for a forensic examination for the two younger children. It later dismissed the petition.

The Supreme Court reversed the dismissal of the second petition because the denial of the motion for the forensic examination prevented the guardian ad litem from developing evidence relevant to the allegations. The Supreme Court further held that the failure to conduct an adjudicatory hearing prevented the guardian ad litem from litigating the allegations of abuse and from articulating concerns about the welfare of the two younger children.

A child who is the alleged victim of sexual abuse may not be interrogated at any time during the abuse or neglect proceeding without the presence of his or her counsel unless counsel waives that right on behalf of the child. When an issue regarding a child's capacity to testify that he/she was a victim of abuse or neglect is presented, the Court should appoint a neutral child psychologist or psychiatrist to conduct a transcribed or otherwise recorded interview to inquire into the child's capacity to be a competent witness. "However, the Court may not force the child to be interviewed by the psychologist or psychiatrist alone unless both the court and the guardian ad litem agree that the interview is best conducted in that manner." Although the guardian ad litem must give permission for such an interview, the trial court may refuse to allow the child to be a witness in the absence of an unimpeded interview with a child psychiatrist or psychologist who can then give some assurance of competency.

Syl. Pt. 5, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991)

The guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home.

In re Skyelan H., 219 W. Va. 661, 639 S.E.2d 753 (2006)

The circuit court entered a final order dismissing a petition because it found DHHR had failed to prove the children were abused or neglected by clear and convincing evidence. Following entry of the final order, the guardian ad litem for the children proffered new evidence to the circuit court in the form of medical records that suggested three of the respondent's four children may have been sexually abused. The guardian moved for a stay of the dismissal order based on this new evidence. The court denied the motion and the guardian ad litem appealed. In a per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case with directions that the circuit court give full consideration to the allegations raised by the guardian ad litem.

This case presented the issue of whether or not a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to the child he or she represents such that the guardian may not reveal the child's revelations of abuse to the court if the child has requested they remain confidential. In resolving this issue, the Court discussed the dual role of a guardian ad litem for children in abuse and neglect cases, which is reflected in the following syllabus points of the Court:

Syl. Pt. 3: Because many aspects of a guardian ad litem's representation of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding comprise duties that are performed by a lawyer on behalf of a client, the rules of professional conduct generally apply to that representation.

Syl. Pt. 4: While a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to the child[ren] he or she represents in child abuse and neglect proceedings, this duty is not absolute. Where honoring the duty of confidentiality would result in the child[ren]'s exposure to a high risk of probable harm, the guardian ad litem must make a disclosure to the presiding court in order to safeguard the best interests of the child[ren].

n. 14, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991)

With regard to the appointment of attorneys to represent children in such actions, it is a better practice for courts to attempt to appoint attorneys who have demonstrated interest in such sensitive matters and who will be committed to achieving a result which will serve the best interest of the child. Furthermore, effectively representing children in abuse and neglect cases frequently requires far more than just legal ability. As courts have increasingly been thrust into the arena of social issues, it has become clear that lawyers and judges must deal with the human dimension of such problems. This requires the willingness and ability to communicate with parents, social workers, physicians, psychiatrists, psychologists and counselors, teachers, and -- most importantly -- children.

B. Appellate Duties of Guardians Ad Litem

Syl. Pt. 3, In the Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991)

In a proceeding to terminate parental rights pursuant to W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, a guardian ad litem, appointed pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a), as amended, must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children. This duty includes exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary. (emphasis added).

See W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f)

In re B.L., Nos. 14-0660, 14-0714 (W. Va. Supreme Ct., June 10, 2015) (memorandum decision); 2015 WL 3631681

This case arose when the Supreme Court issued a rule to show cause against a guardian ad litem for failing to comply with scheduling orders in two abuse and neglect cases. Specifically, the guardian ad litem did not file response briefs and later filed extremely abbreviated summary responses. In turn, the Court issued a rule to show cause because of the lawyer's failure to file timely briefs and the poor quality of the summary responses. As a possible sanction, the Court had considered ordering that the lawyer would not be eligible for future GAL appointments.

As a response to the rule to show cause, the guardian ad litem filed an initial response brief and two supplemental response briefs. She also explained her failure to comply with the scheduling orders because of medical issues and an over-focus on a felony case. In addition, she submitted evidence that supported the generally high quality of her work as a guardian ad litem. Ultimately, the Court did not find this guardian ad litem in contempt. This opinion is, however, an extremely important reminder that the Supreme Court expects a high degree of professionalism for attorneys who represent children in child abuse and neglect cases and that it will issue sanctions in appropriate cases.

In re A.N., Nos. 15-0182, 15-0208 (W. Va. Supreme Ct., September 30, 2015) (memorandum decision); 2015 WL 5738019

This decision addressed a guardian ad litem's failure to comply with scheduling orders issued by the Supreme Court. When the guardian ad litem first failed to file response briefs as scheduled, the Court issued Notices of Intent to Sanction and Amended Scheduling Orders. However, the guardian ad litem still did not file the required response briefs. Because of this failure, the Court issued a rule to show cause. The guardian ad litem ultimately filed response briefs the day before oral argument on the rule to show cause.

In its decision, the Court noted that the guardian ad litem had failed to take responsibility for the untimely filings. Instead, the guardian ad litem had argued that she had decided not to file response briefs as a means to protest the alleged shortcomings of the DHHR and its failure to follow federal guidelines. She also asserted that staffing problems in her office had caused her to be unaware of the deadlines for filing response briefs. The Court, however, did not find the guardian ad litem's responses sufficient to avoid sanctions, and, therefore, found the attorney in contempt for willful violations of the Court's orders. The Court directed the Clerk to refer the matter to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel and directed that she would not be eligible for further guardian ad litem appointments or other court appointments until the conclusion of the disciplinary action.

Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W. Va. 184, 324 S.E.2d 145 (1984)

A custodian, like a parent, has a statutory right to be represented in any abuse or neglect proceeding concerning the child. This includes a meaningful opportunity to be heard, and the opportunity to testify and to present and cross examine witnesses.

D. Guardians Ad Litem for Parents

1. Involuntary Hospitalization for Mental Illness

In the Matter of Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1996)

The Court reversed an order terminating parental rights for a mother who was hospitalized for mental illness in another state during the pendency of the proceedings and for whom no guardian ad litem was appointed. In the following syllabus points, the Court provided guidance concerning the appointment of attorneys and guardians ad litem, and service on parents who are hospitalized for mental illnesses.

Syl. Pt. 3: In abuse and neglect proceedings the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required for adult respondents who are involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness, whether or not such adult respondents have also been adjudicated incompetent.

Syl. Pt. 4: It is error to enter a decree terminating parental rights after a suggestion of involuntary hospitalization for mental illness of the affected parent or custodian without first having appointed a guardian ad litem for such parent or custodian.

Syl. Pt. 5: A parent or custodian named in an abuse and neglect petition who is involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness but who retains all of his or her civil rights, must be effectively served with process, including, if service is personal or by mail, service of a copy of any petition or other pleading upon which an order terminating parental rights may be based.

Syl. Pt. 6: In abuse and neglect cases, service of original process on a guardian ad litem appointed for a parent or custodian involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness whose legal capacity has not been terminated by law cannot be substituted in lieu of service on the hospitalized parent or custodian where the parental rights of such person may be terminated under the process to be served.

Syl. Pt. 9: If the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required for a parent or custodian, the trial court may also provide in its order appointing counsel or in a later order, a direction that the appointment imposes on that counsel the additional status of guardian ad litem, with the attendant duties of protecting the interests of the persons for whom such counsel is appointed guardian ad litem and the attendant duty on the court to see to the protection of such person's interests until and unless it later appears that such person's circumstances do not require the continued protection of a guardian ad litem or that the two functions cannot be performed by the same attorney.

Concerning a dual-status appointment as counsel and guardian ad litem, although conflicts in this dual role are typically rare, three particular areas of potential conflict in the roles of guardian ad litem and counsel, including cases involving counsel and guardians ad litem for children, are as follows: (1) when the best interests of the ward and the ward's wishes are not identical, (2) when a privileged communication is made, and the attorney's duty to protect that communication conflicts with his or her duty as guardian, and (3) when a court would require a guardian ad litem to actually testify in a case, a function that counsel ordinarily should not perform.

The practice of dual appointments is recommended, but if such conflict arises, dual status of counsel should be terminated and a second attorney appointed as guardian ad litem.

2. Incarcerated Adults

n. 4, Kenneth B. v. Elmer Jimmy S., 184 W. Va. 49, 399 S.E.2d 192 (1990)

In footnote 4, the Court noted that the incarcerated father's rights were protected by a guardian ad litem even though the father was not present at a hearing terminating his rights.

E. Duties of County Prosecutor and DHHR

In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996)

DHHR, as a party to this case (usually by its agent, an individual child protective services worker), has the right and responsibility to advocate whatever position it determines proper under the law and in the best interest of the child. However, DHHR also has the duty to follow the court's directives in working on the case from the perspective of the delivery of social services. In a case, such as this, where DHHR refuses to comply with court directives, a circuit court may appoint an agency independent of DHHR to assist in case management. DHHR, however, as the circuit court clearly recognized by virtue of its directive that DHHR remain a party, was not absolved of its statutory duties to Jonathan G. despite its removal as the case manager.

Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997); Syl. Pt. 1, In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Ashton M., 228 W. Va. 584, 723 S.E.2d 409 (2012)

In civil abuse and neglect cases, the legislature has made DHHR the State's representative. In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through W. Va. Code § 49-6-10, that prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Therefore, all the legal and ethical principles that govern the attorney-client relationship, in general, are applicable to the relationship that exists between DHHR and county prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

Syl. Pt. 5, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997)

When county prosecutors represent the DHHR, they may not invoke the Supreme Court of Appeals' appellate or original jurisdiction in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding, unless they have the express consent and approval of DHHR.

When an abuse and neglect petition was brought by a child's grandparents and was dismissed without a hearing, the Supreme Court held that West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 requires the Department to participate in abuse and neglect proceedings and to provide supportive services to remedy the circumstances of abuse and neglect. Upon remand, the Department was to be granted intervenor status.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601

Syl. Pt. 2, in part, In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000); Syl. Pt. 4, In re Emily G., 224 W. Va. 390, 686 S.E.2d 41 (2009)

"[T]he Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights . . .."

F. All Counsel Must Have Opportunity to Advocate

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Mark M., III, 201 W. Va. 265, 496 S.E.2d 215 (1997), Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996)

There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(h)

IX. PROCEDURAL PROTECTIONS FOR CHILDREN

A. Meaning and Purpose of Child Case Plan

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(a)

West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) defines the child case plan as a written document which includes, where applicable, the requirements of the family case plan set forth in W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3, as well as the additional requirements set forth in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a).

W. Va. Code § 49-4-408

Syl. Pt. 4: The purpose of the child's case plan is the same as the family case plan, except that the focus of the child's case plan is on the child rather than the family unit.

B. Concurrent Planning

In re Billy Joe M., 206 W. Va. 1, 521 S.E.2d 173 (1999)

Syl. Pt. 5: Concurrent planning, wherein a permanent placement plan for the child(ren) in the event reunification with the family is unsuccessful is developed contemporaneously with reunification efforts, is in the best interests of children in abuse and neglect proceedings.

Syl. Pt. 6: A permanency plan for abused and neglected children designating their permanent placement should generally be established prior to a determination of whether post-termination visitation is appropriate.

Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 227 W. Va. 184, 706 S.E.2d 381 (2011)

In this case, the child resided with her foster parents from birth until she was 22 months old. After a permanency hearing, in which the foster parents were not allowed to participate, the circuit court found that the child should be placed with her paternal aunt based upon a DHHR policy that preferred the placement of the child with a blood relative. At the time of the appeal, the child had lived with her aunt for ten months. The Court stated that the DHHR should have used concurrent planning in order to provide the child with resolution and permanency. Further, it observed that the DHHR should have contacted the aunt at the outset of the case, had it believed that the child should have been placed with a relative.

C. West Virginia Procedures for Child Witnesses in Abuse and Neglect Cases

In re J.S., 233 W. Va. 394, 758 S.E.2d 747 (2014)

The family in this case involved a mother, a father, the mother's niece who had been placed with the mother in a previous guardianship case, the father's son from a prior relationship and the mother and father's infant son. The allegations against the father involved his sexual abuse of the niece and his sexual abuse of his son on one occasion. The allegations against the mother involved her failure to heed warnings from the DHHR concerning the father's risk to the children's safety.

> The primary evidence offered in support of the allegations were the videotaped forensic interviews of the niece and the father's son and handwritten notes from interviews. Other evidence included a letter from the niece to the mother in which she detailed both the sexual abuse and the father's threats if she were to disclose the sexual abuse. Records from the niece's therapy were also admitted. The children did not testify in the abuse and neglect case, and the focus of the opinion was the admission of the videotaped interviews.
> As an initial basis for appeal, the adult respondents argued that they were denied due process because they were not afforded the opportunity to confront the children and cross-examine them. The Court, however, pointed out that: "The fundamental requirement of procedural due process in a civil proceeding is 'the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner.'" J.S., 758 S.E.2d at 756. The Court went on to explain that: "What would constitute due process in this case must be determined by weighing the competing interests of the children, the parents and the State." Id. Finding that the parents had been afforded due process, the Court noted that the parents had been provided proper notice of the allegations, they had been appointed counsel, they had the opportunity to review evidence in advance of its presentation and to offer rebuttal the evidence.
> Secondly, the adult respondents argued that the presentation of videotaped interviews, as opposed to confrontation and cross-examination, failed to minimize the risk of an erroneous finding. The Court, however, rejected this argument because the adult respondents failed to specify how confrontation and cross-examination would have contributed to the fact-finding process.
> Third, the adult respondents argued that Rule 8(a), the rule that places limits on the testimony of children, violated the right to confrontation and cross-examination established by the relevant statutes in Chapter 49. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(h).[18] Analyzing [18]The relevant part of subsection (h) states as follows: "[T]he party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses." W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(h).

the arguments, the Court observed that the respondents had equated the statutory right to confront and cross-examine established in Chapter 49 with the rule established by Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354 (2004). The Court, however, found that abuse and neglect cases are civil, not criminal and, therefore, the Crawford rule does not apply.

With regard to whether Rule 8(a) conflicts with the statutory right to confront and cross-examine, the Court held that Rule 8(a), as a procedural rule, would determine whether a child should testify or not, because the Court has the constitutional authority to adopt procedural rules. See W. Va. Const., article VIII, § 3. In a new syllabus point, the Court held that:

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(h)

> In a child abuse and neglect civil proceeding held pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 (2009), a party does not have a procedural due process right to confront and cross-examine a child. Under Rule 8(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, there is a rebuttable presumption that the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony. The circuit court shall exclude this testimony if it finds the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony. Syl. Pt. 7, J.S., 758 S.E.2d 747.

The residual provisions of the hearsay rule is now found in W. Va. R. Evid. 807.

The Court further addressed the admissibility of the videotaped interviews under the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, specifically the residual or catch-all provisions established by West Virginia Rules of Evidence 803(24) and 804(b)(5). Analyzing this issue, the Court noted that five general factors must be met in order to be admissible under these provisions. State v. Smith, 358 S.E.2d 188 (W. Va. 1987). Applying this test, the Court found that the evidence appeared to be reliable and that the adult respondents did not attack the interview techniques or trustworthiness of the children's statements. Secondly, the Court observed that the evidence was probative as to the question of the sexual abuse. Third, the Court found that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the evidence was more probative than other evidence and there were sufficient guarantees of trustworthiness to be reliable. Under the fourth element, the Court concluded that the interests of justice would be served by the admission of the interviews. And fifth, the Court pointed out that the DHHR had provided notice of the evidence and that the adult respondents had been provided with the opportunity to meet the evidence. For these reasons, the Court affirmed the admission of the evidence and the termination of parental rights.

In re Joseph A., 199 W. Va. 438, 485 S.E.2d 176 (1997)

In an appeal challenging the termination of parental rights, the respondent father contended that the trial court erred by excluding him from his minor son's in camera testimony. His attorney, however, was present during the minor's testimony. Affirming the circuit court, the Supreme Court held that:

> W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) (1996), provides parties having custodial or parental rights the opportunity to testify during abuse and neglect proceedings and to present and cross-examine witnesses. The requirement of cross-examination is fully met when counsel for the parent or guardian is present during the testimony of a child witness and is given the opportunity to fully cross-examine the witness. Syl. Pt. 3, Joseph A., 485 S.E.2d 176.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601*(h)*

At the time that Joseph A. was decided, the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings had been approved but were not in effect. The Court, however, noted that:

> Rule 8(b) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings controls the procedure for taking testimony from children in abuse and neglect proceedings in future cases. Syl. Pt. 4, Joseph A., 485 S.E.2d 176.

Burdette v. Lobban, 174 W. Va. 120, 323 S.E.2d 601 (1984); State v. Stacy, 179 W. Va. 686, 371 S.E.2d 614 (1988)

A child who is the alleged victim of abuse may not be interrogated at any time during the abuse or neglect proceeding without the presence of his or her counsel unless counsel waives that right on behalf of the child. When a child's capacity to testify that he/she was the victim of abuse or neglect is present, the Court should appoint a neutral child psychologist or psychiatrist to conduct a transcribed or otherwise recorded interview to inquire into the child's capacity to be a competent witness. However, the Court may not force the child to be interviewed by the psychologist or psychiatrist alone unless both the court and the guardian ad litem agree that the interview is best conducted in that manner. The guardian ad litem must give permission, however, the trial court may refuse to allow the child to be a witness in the absence of an impeded interview with a child psychiatrist or psychologist who can then give some assurance of competency.

This appeal involved the dismissal of two successive petitions that were supported by the testimony of a teenage girl. In her testimony supporting the first petition, the teenager did not testify about a specific incident of sexual abuse. Later when she was in foster care, the teenager disclosed the details of the incident that formed the basis of the second petition. The circuit court, however, dismissed the second petition because she had not testified about the incident during a hearing on the first petition. Reversing the circuit court, the Supreme Court noted that:

> Such failure does not render her testimony inherently incredible, and it should not have been the sole basis, as appears from the record, for the lower court's decision to dismiss the second petition. It may have provided the court with a legitimate basis for more rigorous investigation of the allegations, but Elizabeth's credibility, as an alleged child sexual assault victim, should not have been totally devalued by her failure to assert all abusive events during the initial hearing. 617 S.E.2d at 556.

D. Children as Witnesses in Criminal Cases

On a writ of certiorari in a criminal case, the defendant challenged a Maryland procedure which allowed a child sexual abuse victim to testify via one-way closed circuit television on the basis that it violated her Sixth Amendment right of confrontation. Upholding the Maryland procedure, the United States Supreme Court held that "if the State makes an adequate showing of necessity, the state interest in protecting child witnesses from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of a special procedure that permits a child witness in such cases to testify at trial against a defendant in the absence of face-to-face confrontation with the defendant." 497 U.S. at 855, 110 S. Ct. at 3169.

Providing further guidance concerning the necessity of using closed-circuit testimony, the Court noted that trial courts must make the following findings to warrant the use of this technology. First, the trial court must hear evidence and find that the use of closed circuit testimony is necessary to protect the child's welfare. Secondly, the trial court must find that the child would be traumatized by testifying in the presence of the defendant, as opposed to being traumatized by the courtroom in general. Third, the trial court must find that the child's distress or emotional upset must be more than mere nervousness or excitement.

In this federal habeas corpus proceeding, the defendant challenged the use of closed circuit testimony on the basis that the factual determinations related to the necessity of this testimony were unreasonable and that the Iowa courts unreasonably applied Maryland v. Craig, supra. The Iowa trial court based its findings on the unchallenged testimony of one expert who had conducted numerous counseling sessions with the two victims.

On appeal, the Eighth Circuit noted that the expert concluded that testifying in the defendant's presence would be traumatic and would impair the victims' ability to communicate. The Eighth Circuit reasoned that Craig did not require the specific finding that the victim is afraid of the defendant, but rather that Craig required a finding of emotional distress that would impede communication. Additionally, the Eighth Circuit found that the findings were case specific even though the expert testified that all child sex abuse victims would experience trauma if they testified in the abuser's presence. Based upon this reasoning, the Eighth Circuit held that the Iowa courts' factual findings relating to the necessity for closed circuit testimony were not unreasonable and that the Iowa courts did not unreasonably apply the holding of Craig to the facts in this case.

Ault v. Waid, 654 F. Supp. 2d 465 (N.D.W.Va. 2009)

In a federal habeas corpus case, the court found that the defendant's right to confrontation was not violated when the West Virginia circuit court allowed a child sexual abuse victim to testify via closed-circuit television as authorized by West Virginia Code §§ 62-6B-1, et seq. Although there were some minor deviations from the statutory procedure, the district court concluded that the defense either agreed to the deviations or that they had no effect on the defendant's right to confrontation.

E. Children Born During Proceedings

In light of finding that four older children were neglected, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in placing mother's unborn child in protective custody so that child would come under auspices of DHHR once born.

In re Tracy C., 205 W. Va. 602, 519 S.E.2d 885 (1999)

The Court found that the circuit court erred by denying the guardian ad litem's motion to join a child born during the pendency of the proceedings, as well as the child's father.

F. Court Appointed Special Advocates – CASA

n. 5, In re Dejah Rose P., 216 W. Va. 514, 607 S.E.2d 843 (2004)

Rule 52 of this Court's Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides for the appointment of a Court-Appointed Special Advocate (CASA) who has the authority in abuse and neglect cases to independently review the record and advocate the best interests of the child.

X. PROCEDURAL PROTECTIONS FOR PARENTS

A. Appointment of Counsel

Note: For a complete discussion of the appointment of counsel, including when a parent is a co-petitioner with the Department, see Overview Section IV. F.

Syl. Pt. 8, In the Matter of Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995); Syl. Pt. 2, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)

Circuit courts should appoint counsel for parents and custodians required to be named as respondents in abuse and neglect proceedings incident to the filing of each abuse and neglect petition. Upon the appearance of such persons before the court, evidence should be promptly taken, by affidavit and otherwise, to ascertain whether the parties for whom counsel has been appointed are or are not able to pay for counsel. In those cases in which the evidence rebuts the presumption of inability to pay as to one or more of the parents or custodians, the appointment of counsel for any such party should be promptly terminated upon the substitution of other counsel or the knowing, intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Counsel appointed in these circumstances are entitled to compensation as permitted by law.

B. Notice Requirements

In re Travis W., 206 W. Va. 478, 525 S.E.2d 669 (1999)

Syl. Pt. 2: Circuit courts must comply with Rule 31 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect by providing notice of the date, time, and place of the disposition hearing to all parties, their counsel, and the CASA representative, if one was appointed.

The Court expressly stated that: "The end result of this case will doubtless be the same regardless of whether or not the court provides notice of and holds a disposition hearing. However, neither this Court nor circuit courts can simply ignore mandatory procedural requirements." 525 S.E.2d at 677 (emphasis added).

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(e)

Under West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(b), the Department of Health and Human Resources is to be provided notice of all child abuse and neglect proceedings brought in circuit court. The purpose of providing notice to the Department is to allow it to fulfill its statutory duty to participate in abuse and neglect proceedings and to provide services to remedy the situation that is detrimental to the child. See also Syl. Pt. 2, In re George Glenn B., Jr., 532 S.E.2d 64 (W. Va. 2000).

C. Right to Notice of Accusations

A parent accused of sexual abuse by his minor child has a constitutional right to know what his child accuses him of in order to prepare his defense.

D. Mandatory Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Cases

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001)

Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

On October 25, 2006, approximately two months after the birth of Emily G., her parents assigned temporary guardianship of her to her maternal grandparents in a family court proceeding. The guardianship proceeding continued in the family court for the next 21 months, and a guardian ad litem was appointed to protect Emily's interests. Emily's father made several attempts to regain custody; however, court records indicate that the parents' relationship was fraught with domestic violence. Thus, Emily remained in her grandparents' care.

On May 8, 2008, the guardian ad litem made numerous recommendations to the family court aimed at protecting Emily's interests and improving the parenting abilities of her parents. Included was a recommendation for the commencement of abuse and neglect proceedings if the parents failed to fulfill the conditions imposed by the family court. On July 8, 2008, the family court entered a final order giving the maternal grandparents "sole care custody and control" of Emily. Supervised visitation was awarded to both parents. Two months later, the maternal grandparents filed a child abuse and neglect petition in the circuit court seeking the termination of the parents' rights. The circuit court, without holding a hearing or appointing counsel, dismissed the petition finding that the petition did not allege facts sufficient to come within the statutory definition of child abuse and neglect. The grandparents appealed.

Citing procedural error, the Supreme Court vacated the circuit court's order and remanded the case for further proceedings. The Court found that when a petition is filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, a circuit court is required to hold a hearing and appoint counsel for the child. The Supreme Court also noted that under the applicable statute, notice of abuse and neglect proceedings is to be provided to the Department. The purpose of providing notice to the Department is so that it can fulfill its statutory duty established by Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code to join in and participate in abuse and neglect proceedings and to provide supportive services to remedy the circumstances of abuse and neglect. The Court directed that, upon remand, the Department should be granted intervenor status so that it would fulfill its statutory duty.

E. Right to Participate in Hearings

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Joseph A., 199 W. Va. 438, 485 S.E.2d 176 (1997)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(h)

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) provides parties having custodial or parental rights the opportunity to testify during abuse and neglect proceedings and to present and cross-examine witnesses. The requirement of cross-examination is fully met when counsel for the parent or guardian is present during the testimony of a child witness and is given the opportunity to fully cross-examine the witness.

F. Hearing Attendance by Incarcerated Parent

1. Subject to Court's Discretion

Syl. Pt. 10, State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Stephen Tyler R., 213 W. Va. 725, 584 S.E.2d 581 (2003)

Whether an incarcerated parent may attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the circuit court.

Syl. Pt. 11, State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Stephen Tyler R., 213 W. Va. 725, 584 S.E.2d 581 (2003).

In exercising its discretion to decide whether to permit an incarcerated parent to attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights, regardless of the location of the institution wherein the parent is confined, the circuit court should balance the following factors: (1) the delay resulting from parental attendance; (2) the need for an early determination of the matter; (3) the elapsed time during which the proceeding has been pending before the circuit court; (4) the best interests of the child(ren) in reference to the parent's physical attendance at the termination hearing; (5) the reasonable availability of the parent's testimony through a means other than his or her attendance at the hearing; (6) the interests of the incarcerated parent in presenting his or her testimony in person rather than by alternate means; (7) the affect of the parent's presence and personal participation in the proceedings upon the probability of his or her ultimate success on the merits; (8) the cost and inconvenience of transporting a parent from his or her place of incarceration to the courtroom; (9) any potential danger or security risk which may accompany the incarcerated parent's transportation to or presence at the proceedings; (10) the inconvenience or detriment to parties or witnesses; and (11) any other relevant factors.

2. Incarcerated Parent Must Notify Court

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Stephen Tyler R., 213 W. Va. 725, 584 S.E.2d 581 (2003).

In order to activate the procedural protections enunciated in syllabus points 10 and 11 of State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000), an incarcerated parent who is a respondent to an abuse and neglect proceeding must inform the circuit court in which such case is pending that he/she is incarcerated and request the court's permission to attend the hearing(s) scheduled therein. Once the circuit court has been so notified, by the respondent parent individually or by the respondent parent's counsel, the determination of whether to permit the incarcerated parent to attend such hearing(s) rests in the court's sound discretion.

G. Involuntary Sterilization

In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993)

The Court held that an order requiring the DHHR to assist a person with an involuntary sterilization could not be upheld.

XI. ABUSE AND NEGLECT PROCEEDINGS AND THE RIGHT TO REMAIN SILENT

A. Silence as Affirmative Evidence

Syl. Pt. 2, W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002); Syl. Pt. 2, In re K.P., 235 W. Va. 221, 772 S.E.2d 914 (2015)

Because the purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is remedial, where the parent or guardian fails to respond to probative evidence offered against him/her during the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability.

Note: A complete discussion of this case is found in Caselaw Digest XIII. A.

In this case, the Department alleged that the stepfather had engaged in sexual misconduct against his 13-year old stepdaughter. Also facing criminal charges for the allegations, the stepfather elected not to testify at the adjudicatory hearing. The trial court found that the stepfather's silence could not be used against him and at the adjudicatory phase of the case. Rather, the trial court reasoned that silence could only be used against an adult respondent at disposition. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the cases of DHHR ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 475 S.E.2d 865 (W. Va. 1996) and In re Daniel D., 562 S.E.2d 147 (W. Va. 2002) squarely addressed this issue and that the stepfather's silence in the face of the allegations could be used as evidence of his culpability. Accordingly, the Court found that the trial court's analysis was plainly wrong and reversed the trial court on this issue.

W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996)

In footnote 22, the Court listed the protections afforded to respondents who are facing both criminal charges and abuse and neglect proceedings. It should be noted that In re Daniel D. provides further guidance with regard to the right to remain silent and the use of statements made in an abuse and neglect proceeding.

Citing to statutory provisions that prevent the use of information outside of an abuse and neglect case, the Court noted that:

> Such a parent or guardian may be invoking his/her right to remain silent pursuant to the Fifth Amendment because that individual also may be facing criminal charges arising out of the abuse and neglect of the child. The rights of the criminally accused are sufficiently protected, however, by the following statutory provisions: 1) West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a) which allows medical and mental examinations of the child or other parties involved in an abuse and neglect proceeding provides that "[n]o evidence acquired as a result of any such examination of the parent or any other person having custody of the child may be used against such person in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person;" 2) West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 provides that "[a]ll records of the state department, the court and its officials, law-enforcement agencies and other agencies or facilities concerning a child as defined in this chapter shall be kept confidential and shall not be released ...[;]" and 3) West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 provides that "[i]n a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination."

W. Va. Code § 49-4-603(a)

W. Va. Code § 49-5-101

In re Aaron Thomas M., 212 W. Va. 604, 575 S.E.2d 214 (2002) (per curiam)

When a respondent objected to a question about drug use based upon her right to remain silent, the trial court purported to grant her use immunity. On the advice of counsel, the respondent waived her right against self-incrimination and answered the question. The circuit court terminated the respondent's parental rights as a disposition.

On appeal, the respondent argued that the circuit court erred because it lacked authority to grant use immunity. Although the Supreme Court agreed that the circuit court could not grant use immunity, it found that the respondent invited any error when defense counsel approved the waiver of her right against self-incrimination. Providing further reasoning for affirming the termination of her parental rights, the Court noted that the respondent's silence could have been used as affirmative evidence of culpability and that her statement merely confirmed other evidence about her drug use.

C. Medical and Mental Examinations - Subsequent Criminal Proceedings

Syl. Pt. 3, State v. James R., II, 188 W. Va. 44, 422 S.E.2d 521 (1992); Syl. Pt. 6, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002)

No evidence that is acquired from a parent or any other person having custody of a child, as a result of medical or mental examinations performed in the course of civil abuse and neglect proceedings, may be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person. W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a).

Syl. Pt. 7, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-603

West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 was intended to constitute a full and comprehensive prohibition against criminal utilization of information obtained through court-ordered psychological or psychiatric examination, whether for diagnosis, therapy, or other treatment of any nature ordered in conjunction with abuse and neglect proceedings.

D. Confidentiality of Statements Obtained During a Court-Ordered Examination

1. Statute Affords No Meaningful Protection of Confidentiality

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002)

W. Va. Code § 49-5-101

West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 provides no meaningful protection of confidentiality or privilege for statements made by an accused in an abuse and neglect proceeding and is, in fact, designed to facilitate the dissemination of information to those charged with the public duty of prosecuting those who may be or are accused of criminal conduct.

2. Court-Ordered Examination by Experts Who are not Physicians, Psychologists, or Psychiatrists

Syl. Pt. 8, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002)

If a trial court, in the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, requires by its order that an accused submit to an examination by a person proposed by any party as an expert who is neither a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist, such an examination is conducted under warrant of law and is, accordingly, subject to the prohibitions of West Virginia Code § 57-2-3. To the extent that our holding in State ex rel. Wright v. Stucky, 205 W. Va. 171, 517 S.E.2d 36 (1999), conflicts with our holding here regarding the protections afforded by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3, Stucky is hereby modified to exclude from its holding court-ordered examinations in abuse and neglect proceedings.

In State ex rel. Wright v. Stucky, supra, the Supreme Court held that W. Va. Code § 57-2-3 does not provide "use immunity." Therefore, the defendants, subject to both civil and criminal cases after an alleged assault, could not be ordered by the circuit court to answer deposition questions after the defendants asserted a fifth amendment privilege.

As noted, the Supreme Court expressly excluded abuse and neglect cases from the holding of Wright v. Stucky. However, the Court limited the protections afforded by In re Daniel D. to court-ordered examinations, not to investigations before a petition is filed, not to other contact with DHHR workers, and not to MDTs.

3. Protective Order

Syl. Pt. 9, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002)

In an abuse and neglect proceeding, an accused required by court order to undergo an examination by an expert who is neither a physician, psychologist, or psychiatrist is entitled to have the trial court's determinations regarding the protections afforded by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 set forth in a protective order for further reference.

XII. IMPROVEMENT PERIODS

A. Burden of Proof

In re Charity H., 215 W. Va. 208, 599 S.E.2d 631 (2004)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-610

With regard to West Virginia Code § 49-6-12, the statute governing improvement periods, the Court noted "that entitlement to an improvement period is conditional upon the ability of the parent/respondent to demonstrate 'by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period . . ..'" 599 S.E.2d at 638. Further, the Court emphatically stated that: "Both statutory and case law emphasize that a parent charged with abuse and/or neglect is not unconditionally entitled to an improvement period. Where an improvement period would jeopardize the best interests of the child, for instance, an improvement period will not be granted." 599 S.E.2d at 639.

B. Multidisciplinary Treatment Teams

E.H. v. Matin, 201 W. Va. 463, 498 S.E.2d 35 (1997)

Syl. Pt. 2: Multidisciplinary treatment teams must assess, plan, and implement service plans pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-5D-3.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-403

Syl. Pt. 3: The language of W. Va. Code § 49-5D-3 is mandatory and requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to convene and direct treatment teams not only for juveniles involved in delinquency proceedings, but also for victims of abuse and neglect.

Syl. Pt. 5: Circuit courts may specify direct placements of juveniles in out-of-state facilities only: (1) if in accord with the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary team, or if not in accord with that plan(s), then (2) after the circuit court has made specific findings of fact, following an evidentiary hearing, that the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary treatment team is inadequate to meet the child's needs.

W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-401-411

The Court noted that: "Pursuant to Rule 51 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, a multidisciplinary treatment team, as defined in West Virginia Code §§ 49-5D-1 to -7, is to be convened for each abuse and neglect case within thirty days of its filing, consisting of the parties and representatives of agencies who may be able to help in the particular situation." 558 S.E.2d at 632. In Edward B., the Court noted that the multidisciplinary team was not convened and relied, in part, on this failure to reverse the circuit court.

C. Goals of Improvement Periods and Family Case Plans

The goal [of improvement periods and family case plans] should be the development of a program designed to assist the parents in dealing with any problems which interfere with the ability to be an effective parent, and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the DHS and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a responsibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.

D. Formulation of Improvement Period and Family Case Plan

Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. W. Va. DHS v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987); Syl. Pt. 9, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997); Syl. Pt. 4, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); Syl. Pt. 3, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996); Syl. W. Va. Code § 49-4-604

Under W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(b), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the DHS to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-408

In re Elizabeth Jo "Beth" H., 192 W. Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994) (per curiam)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-408*(a)*

W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3(b) further requires "the family case plan . . . shall be furnished to the court within thirty days after the entry of the order referring the case to the department[.]"

Pt. 3, In re Faith C., 226 W. Va. 188, 699 S.E.2d 730 (2010)

In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.

Syl. Pt. 5, State ex rel. W. Va. DHS v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001)

The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3(a) is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems.

In the Interest of Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999)

Since the procedural mechanisms for objecting to and modifying a family case plan are clearly in place, a parent cannot wait until the improvement period has lapsed to raise objections to the conditions imposed on him/her. The rules of procedure which govern abuse and neglect proceedings clearly require that a party seeking to modify a family case plan must act promptly and inform the court as soon as possible of the need for modification.

In re Desarae M., 214 W. Va. 657, 591 S.E.2d 215 (2003) (per curiam)

The trial court granted the appellant an improvement period, but no formal family case plan was ever prepared. The trial court did, however, list goals and requirements for the improvement period on the record. At the conclusion of the improvement period, the trial court terminated the appellant's parental rights.

Holding that the failure to formulate a family case plan was reversible error, the Supreme Court recognized that the relevant statute requires the preparation of a family case plan when the trial court grants an improvement period. The Court further explained the significance of a family case plan as follows:

> A formal family case plan, as mandated by West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3(a), is not only for the benefit and information of the parent seeking improvement; it is equally beneficial and necessary for the caseworkers and other assistive personnel. Without a family case plan, the individuals seeking to assist a parent are limited in their ability to formulate distinct goals, methods of achieving such goals, or means by which success will be judged. 591 S.E.2d at 220.

E. Statutory Limits

State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996)

Statutory limits on improvement periods are mandatory and there comes a time for decision despite genuine emotional bonds. Children deserve resolution and permanency in their lives. Statutorily unauthorized extensions of improvement periods and procedural delays can be so protracted as to violate clear statutory constitutional and common law mandates.

In re Emily B., 208 W. Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000)

Syl. Pt. 5: The commencement of a dispositional improvement period in abuse and neglect cases must begin no later than the date of the dispositional hearing granting such improvement period.

Syl. Pt. 6: At all times pertinent thereto, a dispositional improvement period is governed by the time limits and eligibility requirement provided by W. Va. Code § 49-6-2, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5, and W. Va. Code § 49-6-12.

F. Court Must Make Ruling on Improvement Period

In re Thaxton, 172 W. Va. 429, 307 S.E.2d 465 (1983) (per curiam)

A motion for improvement period was made but never formally ruled upon. However, as a practical matter an improvement period did occur as the mother and the Department entered into a voluntary agreement, subsequent to the motion. Mother agreed to obtain housing, attend parenting classes, and visit her children. She failed to meet the conditions and circuit court terminated her parental rights. This Court reversed, holding that the trial court never ruled on the motion for improvement period, and that when an improvement period is denied the court must state the compelling circumstances warranting the denial.

G. Prohibition Available to Challenge Improvement Periods

State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996)

Prohibition is available to abused and/or neglect children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of greater extent and duration than permitted under governing statutes.

State ex rel. W. Va. DHHR v. Sims, 230 W. Va. 542, 741 S.E.2d 100 (2013) (per curiam)

In this case, the respondent parents were unsuccessful during a pre-adjudicatory improvement period, entered into a stipulated adjudication and were granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem challenged the second improvement period by petitioning for a writ of prohibition. In its analysis, the Supreme Court concluded that the circuit court did not lack jurisdiction to grant the post-adjudicatory improvement period. The Supreme Court also concluded that it could not find that the challenged circuit court ruling was erroneous as a matter of law. Therefore, the Supreme Court denied the petition for a writ of prohibition.

H. Responsibility for Initiation and Completion of Terms

In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)

The respondent's argument concerning the stoppage of services by the Department after the children were removed was based on the assumption that the Department, and not the mother, had the responsibility for initiating contact after the children were removed. The Court found, however, that the parents or custodians have the responsibility to initiate and complete all the terms of the improvement period. Citing to the statute governing improvement periods, the Court noted that while the Department, in some circumstances, must make reasonable efforts to reunify a family, a parent has the responsibility to initiate and complete the terms of an improvement period. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(4). Therefore, the Court affirmed the termination of parental rights.

n. 14, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)

The Court pointed out that the level of interest demonstrated by a parent in visiting his or her children while they are out of the parent's custody is a significant factor in determining the parent's potential to improve sufficiently and achieve minimum standards to parent the child. See In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 182, 191 (1996); State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 259, 470 S.E.2d 205, 213 (1996).

I. Grounds for Denial of Improvement Period

1. No Reasonable Likelihood that Conditions of Neglect or Abuse Could be Corrected

State v. C.N.S., 173 W. Va. 651, 319 S.E.2d 775 (1984)

This case involved four children, ages 2 months to 3 1/2 years old. Although there was no evidence of deliberate misconduct or malicious neglect, the parents were so intellectually, socially, and culturally lacking in parenting ability in both physical and emotional levels, the circuit court finding that there was no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected in the near future was justified.

An important factor justifying denial of the improvement period was the lengthy pattern of the parent's failure to improve despite concerted efforts of the Department to provide services and assistance.

A child who had been previously adjudicated as an abused and neglected child presented at the emergency room with a spiral fracture to his right femur. The DHHR obtained emergency custody of him and his four siblings. The DHHR presented medical evidence at the adjudicatory hearing that established the injury was due to non-accidental trauma. The parents did not present evidence to the contrary; and further, they did not identify the perpetrator or acknowledge the child had been abused. The circuit court found the children were abused. Over the objections of the DHHR, the circuit court granted the parents' motions for a six month post-adjudicatory improvement period. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem appealed.

The Supreme Court reversed the circuit court's order granting an improvement period to the parents. The Court found that in order to establish they were likely to participate in an improvement period the parents were required to acknowledge that the child had been abused. The parents did not make this important initial acknowledgment, and therefore, they did not satisfy the requirements of the statute governing improvement periods.

In re M.M., 236 W. Va. 108, 778 S.E.2d 338 (2015)

This case involved the severe emotional and, arguably, physical abuse of four children. The DHHR removed the children on an emergency basis after the parents, at a youth basketball game, cursed at one of their sons, pulled him, slung him into a wall and knocked his head against a door multiple times.[19] Because the petition did not allege imminent danger, three of the four children returned home before adjudication. As a result of two of the children's in camera testimony at adjudication, the court ordered the removal of all of the children from the home.

Before disposition, the DHHR had initially agreed to an improvement period. In her report, the GAL had originally indicated that she was leaning against an improvement period. At the outset of the disposition hearing, the GAL stated that she was opposed to an improvement period. Counsel for the respondents, however, indicated that they were prepared to proceed with an evidentiary hearing. After hearing extensive testimony, the circuit court denied the respondents' motions for improvement periods. The circuit court relied upon: 1) the respondents' past history of abuse; 2) the older boys' in camera testimony; 3) the parent educator's testimony; 4) psychological evaluations showing that the mother had a "guarded" prognosis and that the father had a "very guarded" prognosis; and 5) the court's assessment of the respondents' credibility.

Discussing relevant law, the Court noted that respondent parents are not unconditionally entitled to improvement periods and that they must show that they should be afforded the opportunity to remedy the abusive or neglectful conditions. The Court also noted that a parent may show compliance with aspects of a case plan but fail to improve their attitude and approach to parenting. The Court expressly stated that: "Fully participating in an improvement period necessarily requires implementing the parenting skills that are being taught through services." 778 S.E.2d at 345.

Reviewing the record in the instant case, the Court concluded that the trial court properly determined that the abusive situation would not be easily corrected and was not likely to improve. The Court referred to facts involving the provision of services several years earlier that did not reduce and prevent further abuse. Therefore, the Court affirmed the termination of parental rights.

As another basis for appeal, the adult respondents argued that the requisite procedures for child abuse and neglect cases had been substantially frustrated because the DHHR had initially submitted a case plan that recommended an improvement period. The Court, however, rejected this argument because counsel for the respondents knew that the GAL might not agree with the improvement period and they also indicated their willingness to proceed. Further, the Court noted that the respondents had the opportunity to present evidence at two hearings. The Court, therefore, affirmed the circuit court.

James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991)

A writ of prohibition was brought against the circuit court judge seeking relief from a court order which granted the father's motion for an in-home improvement period in Ohio and further ordered that two of the children, Timothy M. and James M. be immediately surrendered to their father, with the remaining two siblings to be surrendered within 30 days. The father had abandoned the wife and children (then ages 3, 2, and 1, with a fourth child on the way) in December, 1988, and did not become involved in the children's lives again until January, 1991. The natural mother was unable and or unwilling to care for them despite a great deal of assistance and intervention for more than two years after the abandonment. The children were placed in foster care by DHHR based on physical abuse and medical neglect. There was also evidence that two of the children had been sexually abused by their father.

Granting the writ of prohibition, the Court held that abandonment of a child by a parent constitutes compelling circumstances sufficient to justify the denial of an improvement period.

J. Non-Custodial Improvement Periods

In the Interest of Renae Ebony W., 192 W. Va. 421, 452 S.E.2d 737 (1994)

The infant, Renae Ebony W., through an emergency removal by DHHR, was taken from her parents' custody. The circuit court ratified the emergency removal, but returned the child to the parents for a three month in-home improvement period..0..In a syllabus point, the Court held that:

> Where a child is initially removed from the custody of his or her parents pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-3, and where such emergency taking is subsequently ratified on the basis of a finding of imminent danger, the child shall remain in the temporary legal and physical custody of the State or some responsible relative within the meaning of W. Va. Code § 49-6-3 and out of the alleged abusive home during the improvement period until the circumstances which constitute the imminent danger have ceased to exist, or the alleged abusing person has been precluded from residing in or visiting the home. 452 S.E.2d 737.

In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988)

Mother against whom, with father, a neglect petition was filed should have been granted an improvement period without custody of her five minor children before termination of her parental rights; record did not support conclusion that she had knowingly allowed father's sexual abuse, mother's perceived inability to break from the pattern of abuse was part of the "battered woman's syndrome," and there was no showing that any improvement plan had been developed which mother had failed to follow.

K. Termination by Court of Improvement Period

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993); Syl. Pt. 6, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)

See W. Va. Code § 49-4-610 for the statutory requirements for improvement periods.

Neither W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) nor W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) mandates that an improvement period must last for twelve months. It is within the court's discretion to grant an improvement period within the applicable statutory requirements; it is also within the court's discretion to terminate the improvement period before the time frame has expired if the court is not satisfied that the defendant is making the necessary progress.

In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995)

If a respondent refuses to participate in services designed to remediate the circumstances giving rise to the abuse and neglect, such as participation in individual counseling, then an improvement period will be considered "for naught." Therefore, a "circuit court always has the authority to terminate an improvement period if there is evidence that the parent is not following the conditions prescribed or is failing to make improvement." 461 S.E.2d at 142.

At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

The pivotal issue in this case was whether the mother had successfully completed her improvement period. As a basis to find that the mother was not successful, the trial court relied upon the mother's decision to enter a substance abuse treatment program in another county, as opposed to attending treatment in the county where the abuse and neglect case was pending. For this reason, the court found that the mother had frustrated the goal of reunification and had not made her children her first priority. Accordingly, the mother's parental rights were terminated.

Reversing the circuit court, the Supreme Court noted that the mother had satisfactorily completed both inpatient and outpatient substance abuse treatment, and had participated in therapy and twelve-step groups. The Court also noted that the mother had left an abusive relationship, had remained sober, was employed, was planning to attend college and had obtained housing. In his dissenting opinion, Justice Loughry pointed out that the children had been in the DHHR's custody 29 of the last 32 months and that the mother had been afforded with more than enough time to demonstrate her fitness as a parent.

A circuit judge overseeing a case such as this has an immensely difficult task, for in many abuse and neglect cases there is a genuine emotional bond as well as the natural biological bond between parent and child which courts are understandably hesitant to break if there is hope of meaningful change. In most abuse and neglect cases, the parent(s) may have redeeming qualities that create such hope that they will be able to make the necessary changes to become adequate parents.

Although it is sometimes a difficult task, the trial court must accept the fact that the statutory limits on improvement periods (as well as our case law limiting the right to improvement periods) dictate that there comes a time for decision, because a child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life, and because part of that permanency must include at minimum a right to rely on his or her caretakers to be there to provide the basic nurturance of life.

M. Extension of Improvement Period

Syl. Pt. 2, In the Interest of Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999); Syl. Pt. 7, In re Isaiah A., 228 W. Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(6)

Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(g), before a circuit court can grant an extension of a post-adjudicatory improvement period, the court must first find that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period would not substantially impair the ability of the Department of Health and Human Resources to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child.

Pt. 3, In re K.P., 235 W. Va. 221, 772 S.E.2d 914 (2015)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i)

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c), requires the State Department of Welfare [now the DHS], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the DHS is obligated to meet this burden.

In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991)

The DHHR filed an abuse and neglect case after one of two twin infant boys died. A toxicology report indicated that the cause of death was the ingestion of buprenorphine (Suboxone) with diphenhydramine (Benadryl) adding to the adverse effects. The circuit court conducted a six-day adjudicatory hearing and ultimately found that that the mother had failed to provide appropriate supervision of the infant. After adjudication, the mother successfully completed an improvement period, and she was reunified with her surviving son.

On appeal, the Court conducted an extensive review of the record and found that the circuit court erred in adjudicating the mother. Specifically, the Court noted that the mother was at work at the time the infant must have ingested the drug and the caregivers were appropriate. Secondly, there was no evidence that anyone in the home was either using or abusing buprenorphine. Neither CPS, nor law enforcement had been able to determine how the infant had ingested the drug. Accordingly, the Court reversed the adjudication order.

This case involved a father's alleged sexual abuse of his eleven-year old daughter. At the adjudicatory hearing, the daughter's counselor testified to the girl's statements in therapy that included specific, sensory details of her father's sexual acts. On the other hand, the girl refused to testify at the father's criminal trial, and he was acquitted. At the end of the adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court found that the allegations in the petition had not been proven by clear and convincing evidence.

On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the evidence presented to the trial court and noted that: "the evidence is simply not crystal clear, beyond all doubt." Providing guidance on the applicable standard, the Court went on to explain that the standard of clear and convincing evidence is "the measure or degree of proof that will produce in the mind of the fact finder a firm belief or conviction as to the allegations sought to be established." 759 S.E.2d at 777 (quoting Brown v. Gobble, 474 S.E.2d 489, 494 (W. Va. 1996)). The Court further stated that: "[T]he clear and convincing standard is 'intermediate, being more than a mere preponderance, but not to the extent of such certainty as is required beyond a reasonable doubt in criminal cases.'" Id. (citing cases).

After providing guidance on the standard of proof, the Court noted that the girl, in many interviews, had recounted sexually explicit details and sensory aspects of the abuse. For that reason, the Court concluded that the evidence met the required standard of proof, clear and convincing evidence, and remanded the case for the entry of an order adjudicating the minor children as abused children.

Note: A discussion of the stepfather's silence as evidence of culpability is found in Caselaw Digest Section XI. A.

This case was initiated after a 13-year-old girl, K.P., disclosed that her stepfather, had engaged in sexual misconduct against her. The initial allegations in the petition against the mother and stepfather related to the stepfather's sexual abuse and the mother's failure to protect her daughter. The DHHR later amended the petition to include allegations that the mother had committed emotional abuse against her daughter.

Over the course of multiple interviews, K.P. stated that her stepfather came into her bedroom and rubbed her back and stomach on July 1, 2013. He also rubbed her vaginal area over her clothes. He asked to lick her breasts, but she said no. He then stayed in the room for another 30 minutes and rubbed her back.

In response to this incident in July of 2013, K.P. texted a friend who told her to ask her parents for help. She tried to contact her mother and her father. Initially, she was only able to reach her stepmother, A.P., who made arrangements to come pick her up. Before K.P. left the home, the stepfather begged K.P. not to tell anyone because of the consequences to his life. After the initial disclosure, K.P. also disclosed that her stepfather had touched her in this manner on multiple occasions during the previous year. She explained that the stepfather's request to lick her breasts in July worried her and that was the reason she decided she needed to tell someone. After K.P.'s stepmother picked her up, she took K.P. to meet her father. Her mother, A.C., met up with them and berated her for disclosing what had occurred.

After the initial disclosure, a CPS worker interviewed K.P., and a detective watched the interview. During the course of the abuse and neglect case, K.P. was also subject to an interview and diagnostic testing by Dr. Adrienne Bean, a psychologist. At the adjudicatory hearing, Dr. Bean testified about the sexual abuse allegations and also testified about the fact that K.P.'s mother obsessed about K.P.'s weight and limited her food. According to K.P., her mother was more concerned that she had eaten macaroni and cheese the morning she made the disclosures as opposed to the sexual abuse allegations. Dr. Bean also indicated that she found K.P. to be truthful and that K.P. was not exhibiting symptoms typically shown by victims of sexual abuse. She, however, pointed out that K.P. could well experience them in the future.

At the adjudicatory hearing, the stepfather presented the testimony of Dr. Fremouw who performed diagnostic testing of him. Dr. Fremouw testified that the stepfather did not have the two most common characteristics of convicted sex offenders: an antisocial-psychopathic personality combined with the presence of cognitive schemas or attitudes that justify adult-child or adult forced sexual interactions. Dr. Fremouw, however, made it clear that the evaluation could not prove whether the stepfather had committed the abuse or not. The stepfather did not testify at the adjudicatory hearing.

The mother testified at the adjudicatory hearing and denied the allegations of name-calling. She explained that she restricted unhealthy food from K.P.'s diet. She testified that she knew K.P. was lying on the day of the initial disclosure by the look on her face. She also asserted that K.P. had fabricated the abuse allegations so that she could live with her father.

Dr. Amy Wilson Strange performed a parental fitness evaluation on K.P.'s mother, and she testified that the mother had a very low risk of maltreating her children or allowing another person to do so. She did admit that she knew very little about the sexual abuse allegations and all of her information concerning the allegations came from the mother.

Upon the motion of the respondent parents, K.P. was interviewed and subject to psychological testing by Dr. Bobby Miller. At the adjudicatory hearing, Dr. Miller testified that K.P. believes she can manage things better than the adults in her life, that K.P. had made simple allegations that are hard to prove or disprove and that he believed that K.P.'s actions were motivated by her grandmother's death and by her desire to live with her father. However, Dr. Miller admitted that K.P. had been consistent in recounting the allegations and there was no indication that she was untrustworthy.

After a multi-day adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court concluded that the DHHR had not, by clear and convincing evidence, proven that K.P. had been abused by either of the respondents. The circuit court also found that the stepfather's refusal to testify could not be used as evidence against him at adjudication. The circuit court then dismissed the abuse and neglect petition, and the DHHR and the GAL jointly filed the appeal.

After the Court found that the father's silence could be considered against him at the adjudicatory hearing, the Court addressed the circuit court's finding that the DHHR had not presented clear and convincing evidence that the respondents had committed abuse of K.P. With regard to this issue, the Court noted that the applicable statute does not specify the manner or mode by which the DHHR must meet its burden. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(j). The Court also reiterated that a victim's uncorroborated testimony may be used to prove sexual abuse. See Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Beck, 286 S.E.2d 234 (W. Va. 1981).

The Court noted that the respondents had argued that K.P. was motivated by her desire to live with her father. The Court, however, found the evidence in the record did not support this conclusion. With regard to the alleged inconsistencies in K.P.'s statements, the Court noted that the frequency of the sexual abuse had been described in different ways. As for the inconsistency, the Court noted that K.P.'s inability to be more specific about frequency related to the fact that the conduct had occurred over the course of a year and that the conduct had escalated during the course of the year. With regard to the characterization of the allegations as "simple" and lacking a witness or corroborating evidence, the Court found that just because K.P. had not been subject to penetration or ejaculation, it did not mean that she was lying about the type of sexual misconduct she had experienced. After thoroughly examining the record in this case, the Court held that the circuit court erred when it found that the DHHR had not proved its case by clear and convincing evidence.

As for the allegations of emotional abuse by the mother, the Court first determined that there was no evidence that the mother failed to protect her daughter because there was no evidence that she knew about the sexual abuse before K.P. initially disclosed it. The Court, however, found that the circuit court erred when it failed to recognize that the mother's actions after the disclosure constituted emotional abuse. The Court noted that the mother took actions to prevent K.P. from reporting the abuse and claimed that the stepfather had only rubbed the girl's shoulders. Other evidence indicated that the mother told K.P. that the disclosure could ruin the stepfather's life. The Court expressly stated that: "The post-disclosure conduct of a parent, guardian, or custodian may constitute abuse and neglect." 772 S.E.2d at 926. Based upon this analysis, the Court reversed the circuit court and remanded the case for adjudication orders consistent with the opinion and to conduct post-adjudication proceedings and disposition.

B. Requirement of a Hearing

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Emily G., 224 W. Va. 390, 686 S.E.2d 41 (2009)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(c)

In a child abuse and neglect [case], . . . a court . . . must hold a hearing under W.Va. Code, 49-6-2, and determine "whether such child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case. Syl. Pt. 1, in part, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983)

When grandparents filed an abuse and neglect petition and the circuit court dismissed the case without a hearing, the Supreme Court held that it was error for the petition to have been dismissed without a hearing. The Supreme Court noted that West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 requires a court to conduct a hearing on an abuse and neglect petition.

This case involved a situation in which a 16 year old girl had lived with her grandmother in Pennsylvania throughout her life. During a time that she was extremely upset, she came to visit her father in West Virginia for five days. The West Virginia DHHR removed her from her father's home after allegations of abuse and neglect were reported. An MDT was convened, and all members agreed that the girl should be placed with her grandmother and the case should be dismissed. While the case was pending, the circuit court conducted several hearings, appointed the grandmother as the girl's legal guardian and ultimately dismissed the case.

The Department, even though it had originally agreed to the dismissal, objected and argued that the court should conduct a full adjudicatory hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of the petition because the circuit court had provided the Department with an opportunity to be heard as required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c) and because the circuit court found that a full adjudication would not be in the girl's best interests. In footnote 3 of the opinion, the Court cited In re T.W., 737 S.E.2d 69 (W. Va. 2012) as a contrary example.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(h)

C. Collateral Acts or Crimes and Expert Opinion Testimony

State v. Edward Charles L., Sr., 183 W. Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990)

The Court held that collateral acts or crimes may be introduced in cases involving child sexual assault or sexual abuse victims to show the perpetrator had a lustful disposition towards children generally or a lustful disposition to specific other children provided such incidents relate reasonably close in time to the incidents giving rise to the indictment. This holding overruled the Court's prior holding in State v. Dolin, 347 S.E.2d 208 (W. Va. 1986) involving collateral acts.

The lower court's admission of the child's statements to the treating psychologist was upheld under W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) (statements for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment) and a two-part test for admitting statements under this exception was established:

> (1) the declarant's motive in making the statements must be consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment, and
> (2) the content of the statement must be such as is reasonably relied upon by a physician in treatment or diagnosis.

The child's statements to his mother were also properly admitted under the exception found in W.Va.R.Evid. 803(24). The critical factor in upholding the admission under this exception was the fact that the children involved in this case both testified at trial, and neither the mother nor the psychologist added anything substantive to the children's testimony.

The residual exception to the hearsay rule is now set forth in W. Va. R. Evid. 807.

Finally, this Court upheld the lower court's admission of opinion testimony by a psychologist. Expert psychological testimony in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse is permissible and an expert may state an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused. Children who are victims of sexual abuse and assault frequently exhibit behavioral and emotional characteristics indicative of child sexual abuse victims. Such an expert may not, however, give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor may he give an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant.

D. Expert Testimony Regarding Statements Made by a Child During Treatment

In re the Marriage of Misty D.G., 221 W. Va. 144, 650 S.E.2d 243 (2007)

In a child custody case, the family court admitted testimony from a counselor who evaluated and treated a child because of sexual abuse allegations. The counselor testified about the child's identification of the abuser, her mother's boyfriend, and the details of the sexual abuse. Based upon the testimony, the family court ordered supervised visitation for the mother. On appeal, the circuit court held that the family court improperly allowed the counselor to testify as to the identity of the abuser and improperly allowed other family members to testify as to statements the child had made.

The Supreme Court recognized that statements a child makes to their treating therapist or counselor regarding the identity of their abuser and the nature of the abuse may be relevant to proper diagnosis and treatment. The Court held that such statements may be admitted pursuant to the hearsay exception in Rule 803(4) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, the rule that allows for the admission of statements for the purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. Affirming the admission of statements made to a treating therapist, the Court held that:

> When a social worker, counselor, or psychologist is trained in play therapy and thereafter treats a child abuse victim with play therapy, the therapist's testimony is admissible at trial under the medical diagnosis or treatment exception to the hearsay rule, West Virginia Rule of Evidence 803(4), if the declarant's motive in making the statement is consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment and the content of the statement is reasonably relied upon by the therapist for treatment. The testimony is inadmissible if the evidence was gathered strictly for investigative or forensic purposes. Syl. Pt. 4, Misty D.G., 650 S.E.2d 243 (quoting Syl. Pt. 9, State v. Pettrey, 549 S.E.2d 323 (W. Va. 2001), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 1142 (2002)).

E. Transcript of Criminal Case

Syl. Pt. 2, in part, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992); Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. George B. W. v. Kaufman, 199 W. Va. 269, 483 S.E.2d 852 (1997)

If the sexual abuse allegations were previously tried in a criminal case, then the transcript of the criminal case may be utilized to determine whether credible evidence exists to support the allegations. If the transcript is utilized to determine that credible evidence does or does not exist, the transcript must be made a part of the record in the civil proceeding so that this Court, where appropriate, may adequately review the civil record to conclude whether the lower court abused its discretion.

F. Stipulation

W. Va. DHHR v. Brenda C., 197 W. Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996) (per curiam)

Parties may stipulate as to adjudication and specific factual basis therefore; however, there must be compliance with the Rules of Evidence and follow appropriate procedure.

The concurring opinion also addresses issues pertaining to the petition, notice, non-waiver of defects, adjudication, stipulations, finality of orders and termination of parental rights.

G. Abandonment as Neglect

In re Destiny Asia H., 211 W. Va. 481, 566 S.E.2d 618 (2002)

When a biological mother left her child in the care of a third party for a much longer period of time than anticipated, the circuit court held that the child was not neglected because the mother had simply transferred guardianship to another caretaker. The Supreme Court reversed and held that the child was abandoned when the mother's "stay exceeded what was contemplated and when she allowed the thread of potential contact between her and the child's actual care giver to break." 566 S.E.2d at 621.

H. Drug Use as Abuse

In re Aaron Thomas M., 212 W. Va. 604, 575 S.E.2d 214 (2002) (per curiam)

"We believe that the circuit court was not clearly erroneous in finding the children were emotionally abused by Christina L.'s repeated drug use in their presence."

I. Abuse of Another Child in the Home

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); Syl. Pt. 8, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997); Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. DHHR v. Fox, 218 W. Va. 397, 624 S.E.2d 834 (2005)

Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a).

Although there was no direct evidence of abuse against the child named in the petition, the Department contended that the child was abused because the child's brother had been allegedly killed by the child's father. Based upon extensive expert testimony, the trial court found that the child was not abused because the testimony indicated that the child's death was the result of an earlier accidental fall, not the result of Shaken Baby Impact Syndrome. After a careful review of the record, the Supreme Court concluded that the trial court's finding was not clearly wrong.

The dissenting and two concurring opinions addressed the significance of the father's entry of an Alford or Kennedy plea, "a guilty plea by a defendant who continues to protest his or her innocence," 624 S.E.2d 834, n. 4, in his criminal case. (This type of plea was recognized by the West Virginia Supreme Court in Kennedy v. Frazier, 357 S.E.2d 43 (W. Va. 1987), and it may be referred to as Kennedy plea).

The dissent indicated that the entry of an Alford plea to an involuntary manslaughter charge supported a conclusion of child abuse. In a concurring opinion, however, it was noted that the father's entry of an Alford plea allowed him the opportunity to avoid prison and thereby the chance to regain custody of his son. In the second concurring opinion, it was recognized that the entry of the plea was the result of the financial burden associated with the defense of the criminal charges.

J. Insufficient Evidence

This case involved a situation in which a grandfather and father engaged in a physical alternation with each other. The children's mother attempted to intervene, but ultimately struck the grandfather. Also, the children witnessed the fight. The circuit court adjudicated the father because he engaged in domestic violence in the presence of the children and the mother because she failed to protect them. However, the Supreme Court held that the one isolated occurrence of domestic violence could not serve as a basis for adjudication of the father. Similarly, the Court held that there was an insufficient basis to find that the mother had "knowingly allowed" the father to commit abuse or neglect.

XIV. DISPOSITIONAL HEARING

A. Adjudication is a Prerequisite

Syl. Pt. 1, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983); Syl. Pt. 2, W. Va. DHHR v. Brenda C., 197 W. Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996); Syl. Pt. 1, In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Kasey M., 228 W. Va. 221, 719 S.E.2d 389 (2011)(per curiam); Syl. Pt. 3, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601*(i)*

In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code § 49-6-2, and determine "whether the child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.

In re Kristopher E., 212 W. Va. 393, 572 S.E.2d 916 (2002) (per curiam)

In this per curiam opinion involving extraordinary facts, the Court found that the circuit court's finding of abuse and neglect was clearly erroneous. The Court also held that a circuit court could accept a voluntary surrender agreement without reaching the question of abuse and neglect. However, the Court did not discuss or overrule State v. T.C. which requires a finding of abuse or neglect before a case can continue.

In re Kasey M., 228 W. Va. 221, 719 S.E.2d 389 (2011)(per curiam)

The Supreme Court held that the circuit court erred when it transferred custody of a child from his father to his mother when the DHHR, before adjudication, voluntarily dismissed the abuse and neglect petition against the father. The Court explained that it was error to proceed to disposition when the child had not been adjudicated as an abused or neglected child.

B. Voluntary Dispositional Plan

Syl. Pt. 2, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983); Syl. Pt. 4, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012)

W.Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq., does not foreclose the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan. However, such arrangements are not without restrictions. First, the plan is subject to the approval of the court. Second, and of greater importance, the parties cannot circumvent the threshold question which is the issue of abuse or neglect.

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998)

In a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights.

Syl. Pt. 9, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012)

In an abuse and neglect case, the offer of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights does not obviate the statutory requirements regarding the necessity for proceeding with the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of the abuse and neglect case. Prior to accepting an offer of voluntary termination of parental rights, a reviewing court must conduct the hearings required by West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-2 and 49-6-5.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604

A father, John W., resided in West Virginia with his two older children. His younger two children resided primarily with their mother, Stephanie D., in Maryland, but they visited with their father in West Virginia. An abuse and neglect petition was filed against the father, and it was based upon deplorable conditions in his home, abandonment, physical abuse and the father's sexual misconduct with one of his older daughters. Although one of the younger girls was allegedly raped by the boyfriend of one of the older girls during a visit with her father, this fact was never included in the original or amended petition.

As a defensive maneuver, the father offered to relinquish his parental rights to his older children without any admission of abuse or neglect and conditioned his relinquishment upon the absence of any further proceedings against him in the abuse and neglect case. Although the guardian ad litem requested that the court conduct an in camera hearing to hear testimony from the older children, the circuit court did not do so. Ultimately, it accepted the father's relinquishment with regard to his older children and dismissed the younger two children from the case. In response, the mother of the younger two children filed an appeal.

After reviewing the record, the Supreme Court found that the circuit court erred by failing to conduct a full evidentiary hearing, including an in camera hearing with the older children, concerning the grievous allegations of abuse and neglect. The Court held that the offer of a voluntary relinquishment does not relieve a circuit court of its obligation to conduct adjudicatory and disposition hearings.

As additional grounds for reversal, the Court noted that the failure to conduct the required hearings was contrary to the children's best interests because the father's visitation with both sets of children remained a possibility. However, the allegations of the petition indicated that the children would be at risk if visitation were allowed to occur. The Court, therefore, concluded that it was contrary to the children's best interests for the circuit court to have failed to conduct full adjudicatory and disposition hearings. Providing guidance for further proceedings upon remand, the Court directed the circuit court to appoint a separate guardian ad litem for the younger children, as had been previously requested by the guardian ad litem. The Court further directed the DHHR to include the allegations of the rape of one of the younger children in an amended petition.

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Marley M., 231 W. Va. 534, 745 S.E.2d 572 (2013)

Where during the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a parent offers to voluntarily relinquish his or her parental rights and such relinquishment is accepted by the circuit court, such relinquishment may, without further evidence, be used as the basis of an order of adjudication of abuse and neglect by that parent of his or her children.

Note: For a complete discussion of this case, see Caselaw Digest, XVII. C.

C. Mandatory to Conduct Dispositional Hearing

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998); Syl. Pt. 8, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012)

In a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights.

Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. W. Va. DHHR and Chastity D. v. Hill, 207 W. Va. 358, 532 S.E.2d 358 (2000); Syl. Pt. 7, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012)

In a child abuse and neglect proceeding where abandonment of the child by either or both biological parents is alleged and proven, the circuit court should decide in the dispositional phase of the proceeding whether to terminate any or all parental rights to the child. Before making that decision, even where there are written relinquishments of parental rights, the circuit court is required to conduct a disposition hearing, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 and Rules 33 and 35 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, at which the issue of such termination is specifically and thoroughly addressed.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604

Syl. Pt. 4, In re K.L., 233 W. Va. 547, 759 S.E.2d 778 (2014)

"[T]he burden of proof in a child neglect or abuse case does not shift from the State Department of [Health and Human Resources] to the parent, guardian or custodian of the child. It remains upon the State Department of [Health and Human Resources] throughout the proceedings." Syl. Pt. 2, in part, In the Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

The petition in K.L. was based solely upon the mother's prior involuntary termination of parental rights to the child's older sibling. At disposition, the circuit court shifted the burden to the mother and required her to show a substantial change in circumstances since the prior involuntary termination of her parental rights. Although this issue was not presented on appeal, the Supreme Court applied the plain error doctrine and held that the mother's due process rights had been violated by shifting the burden to her. The case was remanded to the circuit court with the directive that, if the DHHR wanted to proceed on abuse or neglect allegations against the mother, it would have to include specific allegations of abuse or neglect in any amended petition. The Court observed that such allegations could include that the mother had failed to correct the circumstances of abuse and neglect that led to the prior termination of her parental rights, the standard established by Syllabus Point 5 of In re George Glen B., Jr., 532 S.E.2d 64 (W. Va. 2000).

E. Controlling Standard for Disposition

Syl. Pt. 4, In re B.H., 233 W. Va. 57, 754 S.E.2d 743 (2014)

In making the final disposition in a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the level of a parent's compliance with the terms and conditions of an improvement period is just one factor to be considered. The controlling standard that governs any dispositional decision remains the best interests of the child.

The respondent mother was subject to an abuse and neglect case because she was in a relationship with a registered sex offender who, in turn, sexually abused her two minor daughters. During the case, custody of the children was granted to the noncustodial father. At disposition, the circuit court placed the children with their father as the primary residential parent and granted the mother unsupervised visitation. She appealed the final disposition on the basis that she had complied with the case plan and had not been afforded enough unsupervised visitation time to prove that the abusive and neglectful conditions in her home had been corrected.

Rejecting the mother's argument, the Supreme Court recognized that completing assigned tasks in an improvement period is not the pivotal question at disposition. Rather, the Court stated that: "Indeed, the overriding consideration must be whether the issues that brought about the allegations of abuse and/or neglect have been addressed by the parent in a substantive and effective manner, and whether those conditions of abuse and/or neglect have been sufficiently remedied such that it is in the child's best interests to be returned to the parent's custody." 754 S.E.2d at 751.

The Supreme Court further observed that the circuit court had a difficult task in determining whether the mother had made sufficient improvements to justify the return of the children. The Court noted that:

> Unlike an abuse and neglect proceeding that involves a dirty home or a parent abusing drugs, where a parent's success in an improvement period can be measured in concrete terms of whether the home is clean or the parent's drug screens are negative, here, the circuit court had to assess whether the mother had internalized what the service providers endeavored to teach her during her improvement period and whether she would, in fact, protect her children by avoiding relationships with individuals in whose presence her children were placed at risk of abuse. 754 S.E.2d at 752.

F. Accelerated Disposition Hearing

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Travis W., 206 W. Va. 478, 525 S.E.2d 669 (1999)

Pursuant to Rule 32 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, circuit courts may hold accelerated disposition hearings immediately following adjudication hearings if: (1) the parties agree; (2) the child's case plan which meets the requirements of W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-5 and 49-6D-3 is provided to the court or the party or parties waive the requirement that the child's case plan be submitted prior to disposition; and (3) notice is provided or waived.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604

W. Va. Code § 49-4-408

G. Child Case Plan and Permanency Plan

State ex rel. S.C. v. Chafin, 191 W. Va. 184, 444 S.E.2d 62 (1994)

Syl. Pt. 1, in part: If, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-2, the court finds the child to be abused or neglected, then both the DHHR and the court, no later than 60 days after the child is placed in the temporary custody of the DHHR, are to proceed with the disposition of the child, in compliance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-5. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) requires the DHHR to file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(a)

West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) defines a case plan as a written document which includes, where applicable, the requirements of the family case plan as set forth in W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3, as well as the additional requirements set forth in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a).

W. Va. Code § 49-4-408

Syl. Pt. 4, in part: The purpose of the child's case plan is the same as the family case plan except that the focus of the child's case plan is on the child rather than the family unit.

H. Modification of Dispositional Orders

In re Cesar L., 221 W. Va. 249, 654 S.E.2d 373 (2007)

A mother had been subject to prior abuse and neglect cases, and her rights to her first three children were terminated. When her fourth child was born, both she and her son tested positive for drugs. Based upon the previous involuntary termination of parental rights and the positive drug tests, the fourth child was removed from her care. During the case, she was incarcerated in Virginia for an outstanding warrant.

While incarcerated, the mother executed a voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights. Approximately seven months later, she moved to modify the dispositional order pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-6. This code section allows a child, a child's parent or custodian or the DHHR to move for a modification of a dispositional order until the child has been adopted. The circuit court held that the mother lacked standing to modify the dispositional order because she could no longer be considered the child's parent. In response to this ruling, she moved to withdraw her voluntary relinquishment, but the circuit court concluded that she had failed to prove that she had been subject to fraud or duress.

On appeal, the West Virginia Supreme Court held that the mother could no longer be considered the child's parent because the voluntary relinquishment severed her parental relationship to her child. Extending this reasoning to cases of both voluntary and involuntary termination of parental rights, the Court concluded that: "[A]n involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights permanently severs the parent-child relationship and relieves such person of all the rights and privileges, as well as duties and obligations, considered to be 'parental rights. . . .'"

After examining the language of the relevant statute, the West Virginia Supreme Court adopted the following syllabus points that concern voluntary relinquishments:

Syl. Pt. 3: W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 permits a parent to voluntarily relinquish his/her parental rights. Such voluntary relinquishment is valid pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 if the relinquishment is made by "a duly acknowledged writing" and is "entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud."

W. Va. Code § 49-4-607

Syl. Pt. 5: A valid voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, effectuated in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-7, includes a relinquishment of "rights to participate in the decisions affecting a minor child," W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o), and causes the person relinquishing his/her parental rights to lose his/her status as a parent of that child.

W. Va. Code § 49-1-204

With regard to cases involving both voluntary and involuntary termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court held that such a person has lost his or her status as a parent and, therefore, lacks standing to modify a dispositional order. Affirming the circuit court, the Supreme Court adopted the following syllabus points:

Syl. Pt. 1: The plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 permits a child, a child's parent or custodian, or the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to move for a modification of the child's disposition where a change of circumstances warrants such a modification. However, a child's disposition may not be modified after he/she has been adopted.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-606

Syl. Pt. 2: For purposes of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, "parent" means the biological or natural father or mother of a child; the adoptive father or mother of a child; or the legal guardian of a child.

Syl. Pt. 4: A final order terminating a person's parental rights, as the result of either an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, completely severs the parent-child relationship, and, as a consequence of such order of termination, the law no longer recognizes such person as a "parent" with regard to the child(ren) involved in the particular termination proceeding.

Syl. Pt. 6: A person whose parental rights have been terminated by a final order, as the result of either an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, does not have standing as a "parent," pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, to move for a modification of disposition of the child with respect to whom his/her parental rights have been terminated.

The mother's substance abuse and related problems resulted in this abuse and neglect case. After initial proceedings, the trial court issued a disposition order and placed custody of S.W., a young child, with his paternal grandparents. Under this same order, the mother and the maternal grandparents were afforded liberal visitation with the child. At the permanency hearing, the trial court granted legal guardianship to the grandparents.

Approximately nine months after the permanency hearing, the mother petitioned to overturn or dissolve the legal guardianship. As grounds for her petition, the mother cited her graduation from drug court and continued sobriety for over a year. She also presented evidence of the bond between herself and the child. As a result of this evidence, the circuit court terminated the legal guardianship and ordered a transfer of custody to occur within ten days.

On appeal, the GAL and the paternal grandparents argued that the circuit court erred by terminating the legal guardianship. The DHHR joined in their position.

The Court noted that the mother's petition to terminate the legal guardianship was premised upon West Virginia Code § 49-6-6 (now codified at West Virginia Code § 49-4-606). Under this statute, there are two prerequisites for the modification of a dispositional order: 1) a material change of circumstances; and 2) the modification or alternation of the disposition must serve the best interests of the child. As part of its analysis, the Court reviewed the minor guardianship statute, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, and Rule 46 of the West Virginia Rules of Child Abuse and Neglect, and concluded that they include the same two requirements for the modification of a guardianship: 1) a substantial change of circumstances; and 2) the child's best interests. Further, the Court noted that it had addressed the same requirements in a case involving the termination of a family court guardianship. See In re K.H., 773 S.E.2d 20 (W. Va. 2015).

After reviewing the evidence presented, the Court found that the record was insufficient to conclude that it was in S.W.'s best interests to terminate the guardianship. The Court noted that the mother had made significant improvements, but pointed out that the mother did not articulate how the termination of the guardianship would promote the child's best interests. As an example, the Court noted that the mother was unaware as to whether the child would have to change schools. The Court reversed the circuit court and remanded the case for the entry of a visitation order with the mother and maternal grandparents. The Court instructed that the contact between the child and his mother should be extensive. The Court also noted that the visitation schedule would be subject to modification as the circumstances might warrant and as the child aged.

XV. PLACEMENT WITH A PARENT

In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995)

If a court should eventually determine that the child should be reunified with a parent, such change should be accomplished with a sufficient gradual transition period to enable the child to accept the change with as little upheaval as possible to his life.

If a court eventually reunifies a child with a parent, the court should "inquire into the relationship [the child] has formed with his foster parents and, if it is in his best interest, fashion a plan for continued association between the foster parents and the child. . . [A] child has a right to continued association with those to whom he has formed an emotional bond." 461 S.E.2d at 144.

B. Placement with a Nonoffending Parent

In re Frances J.A.S., 213 W.Va. 636, 584 S.E.2d 492 (2003)

In this case, there were four children named in the petition. In addition, there were three adult respondents: Melissa R. -- the mother of all four children; David R. -- the biological father of the two younger children; and Darrell S. -- the biological father of the two older children. Darrell S. had been previously married to Melissa R. Although Darrell S. did not have custody of his children prior to this case, he had maintained contact with them.

During a post-adjudicatory improvement period, the circuit court placed the two older children with their biological father, Darrell S. At the conclusion of this improvement period, Melissa R. and David R. were granted a dispositional improvement period, and physical custody of the two older children was returned to them. The circuit court ordered this custody transfer even though one of the two older children testified that she wanted to remain with her father.

On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the ruling concerning the custody change because the circuit court had failed to make explicit findings concerning the best interests of the children. The Supreme Court noted that "simple reunification" might not be in the children's best interests and that the minor child's stated preference should be considered. The Court further instructed that the principles set forth in the opinion should be applied to the permanent placement of the children.

This case involved a ruling by the circuit court in which it returned two children to their mother and stepfather after successful completion of improvement periods. Also successfully completing an improvement period, the biological father requested custody of the children, but the circuit court did not consider him as a possible placement. Rather, the circuit court simply restored the children to their last custodial placement before the Department filed an abuse and neglect petition. While the appeal was pending, one of the children returned to live with her father.

After reviewing the record, the Supreme Court concluded that the circuit court erred because it failed to consider placement of the children with their father. The Court remanded the case to the circuit court with directions to consider placement with the father and to review any updated information.

During the course of an abuse and neglect case, the appellant father was identified as the biological father of one of the four children in this case. Another man, the father of the other three children, had been originally named as the child's father on the birth certificate. Although there had been no allegations advanced against the biological father and he had been cooperative with services, the circuit court found that it was in the child's best interests to remain with his siblings and in the care of his maternal grandparents who had been identified as "psychological parents" of all four children. During the case, the circuit court had adjudicated the grandparents as abusive or neglectful caretakers of the children.

The Supreme Court held that the circuit court erred in its ruling because the appellant father, as a non-abusing, non-neglectful parent, had a right to custody of his child. Not only were there no allegations of abuse or neglect advanced against him, he and his wife were approved foster parents. Although there had been minimal evidence that he had not attended all visitations with his child, the record showed that the child's maternal grandfather had intimidated him as a means to prevent him from exercising his visitation rights. On remand, the circuit court was directed to consider whether sibling visitation or visitation with the grandparents should be established.

An abuse and neglect petition was filed against a mother because she had entered into a relationship with a registered sex offender who sexually abused her children. The children's father had not had contact with the children for an extended period of time because of the mother's interference with the relationship and the mother's transient lifestyle. During the case, the mother began a relationship with another sex offender and, initially, believed that the sex offender was innocent. Although the mother ultimately was successful in completing her improvement period, the circuit court named the father as the primary residential parent and granted the mother unsupervised visitation as a final disposition.

On appeal, the mother argued that she had substantially complied with the terms of her improvement period. The Supreme Court, however, found that the pivotal question at disposition is not whether a parent has completed assigned tasks, but whether the disposition is in the child's best interests. With regard to the facts of the case, the Court noted that the children's school attendance had improved, they were living in a more stable home and there were no safety concerns with the father's home. In a new syllabus point, the Court held that:

> In making the final disposition in a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the level of a parent's compliance with the terms and conditions of an improvement period is just one factor to be considered. The controlling standard that governs any dispositional decision remains the best interests of the child. Syl. Pt. 4, B.H., 754 S.E.2d 743.

As an alternative, the mother argued that she had not been granted enough unsupervised visitations to demonstrate that she had improved. The Court, however, rejected this argument because the mother, through her own actions, had caused the delay in obtaining unsupervised visitation.

XVI. GROUNDS FOR TERMINATION OF PARENTAL RIGHTS

A. Least Restrictive Alternatives

Syl. Pt. 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980); Syl. Pt. 2, W. Va. DHHR v. Billy Lee C., 199 W. Va. 541, 485 S.E.2d 710 (1997); Syl. Pt. 7, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Danielle T., 195 W. Va. 530, 466 S.E.2d 189 (1995); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Dejah Rose P., 216 W. Va. 514, 607 S.E.2d 843 (2004); Syl. Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(b) that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980); Syl. Pt. 5, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Lacey P., 189 W. Pt. 5, In re Kristin Y., 227 W. Va. 558, 712 S.E.2d 55 (2011)

As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

In this case, the respondent father had a serious mental illness and, despite receiving significant assistance during an improvement period, was unable to adequately parent his son. At the conclusion of the improvement period, the circuit court declined to terminate the father's parental rights and instead approved a permanency plan that involved legal guardianship of the child by a maternal aunt and uncle.

The father appealed the ruling and argued that the circuit court failed to consider a less drastic alternative. Affirming the circuit court, the Supreme Court noted that the ruling, although difficult, afforded the father regular and meaningful contact with his son. The Supreme Court further noted that this permanency plan would allow the father to modify the role he was playing in his son's life if his mental health significantly improved in the future. The Court concluded the opinion by encouraging the circuit court to promptly rule on the pending guardianship petition.

The standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof.

On appeal, a mother argued that the evidence that served as a basis for the termination of her parental rights failed to meet the requisite level of proof. Apparently, the primary basis for the termination of parental rights was an alleged statement by the daughter that the mother had taught her how to masturbate. Supposedly, the child made this statement to a CPS worker during a forensic interview, but neither the CPS worker, nor the child ever testified that the child actually made this statement. In addition, the Court noted that the mother had consistently visited with her children and interacted well with them. The bond between the mother and her children was recognized by visit supervisors. The mother also engaged in parenting classes and attended all hearings. Further, a therapist testified that the mother had gained insight, both concerning her self-worth and what she needed to do to be reunified with her children. The only unfavorable evidence was presented by a CPS worker, and his allegations were uncorroborated. Therefore, the Court concluded that the disposition order must be reversed on the grounds of clear error.

C. Finding of Imminent Danger Not Required

State v. Carl B., 171 W. Va. 774, 301 S.E.2d 864 (1983) (per curiam)

The circuit court terminated parental rights after four improvement periods. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding: (1) there is no requirement that the court find that the children were in imminent danger; and (2) that immediate appointment of counsel for indigent parent in hearing following emergency taking was sufficient.

W. Va. DHS v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990) (per curiam)

DHS filed for temporary custody of six of the mother's eleven children alleging abuse and neglect. DHS was ordered to prepare and submit a family case plan. Following hearings on success of improvement period, the circuit court ordered termination of mother's parental right to five of the six children and ordered the child over fourteen to remain in the temporary custody of the DHS until her eighteenth birthday. The mother appealed and Supreme Court upheld the trial court's findings and conclusions, found that DHS was not required to prove its case by showing that the mother failed to comply with the family case plan, and found the trial court complied with the statutory requirements in terminating the parental rights.

E. Required Findings to Warrant Termination of Parental Rights

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001)

Where a trial court order terminating parental rights merely declares that there is no reasonable likelihood that a parent can eliminate the conditions of neglect, without explicitly stating factual findings in the order or on the record supporting such conclusion, and fails to state statutory findings required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) on the record or in the order, the order is inadequate. Likewise, where a trial court removes a child from the custody of an alleged neglectful parent and places exclusive custody in another individual, the court must adhere to the mandates of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5), and failure to include statutorily required findings in the order or on the record renders the order inadequate.

G. Considering the Wishes of a Child Who Is of An Age of Discretion

In the Interest of Jessica G., 226 W. Va. 17, 697 S.E.2d 53 (2010)

Respondent father failed to meet the terms of his improvement, and DHHR petitioned the circuit court to terminate his parental rights to his 13 year-old daughter. The guardian ad litem argued against termination, asserting that while placement in the home was not in her best interests, the child did not want her father's rights terminated and her wishes should be considered. The circuit court granted DHHR's petition, and the father appealed, claiming that the court failed to consider his daughter's wishes as required by the relevant statute.

See W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)

The Supreme Court vacated the circuit court's order and remanded the case for further proceedings. The Court found that given the child's age, her express wishes, and the bond that existed between her and her father, the circuit court should have determined whether termination was in her best interests. Specifically, the circuit court should have considered the child's wishes, as required by the disposition statute, before terminating her father's parental rights. On remand, the circuit court was instructed to conduct this analysis, and further, it was to determine whether permanent foster care would serve the child's best interests.

In re Ashton M., 228 W. Va. 584, 723 S.E.2d 409 (2012)

In this case, the circuit court found that a 16 year old girl had been sexually abused by her mother's boyfriend. The girl's mother refused to believe that the sexual abuse had occurred and continued to live with her boyfriend. At disposition, the mother asserted that only her custodial rights, not her parental rights should be terminated. The Department agreed with this position. The guardian ad litem indicated that she was not sure that the girl would understand the difference between the termination of parental rights versus custodial rights, but that she wished to maintain contact with her mother. On the record, the circuit court noted that it did not know the girl's wishes with regard to the termination of parental rights. Ultimately, however, it terminated the mother's parental rights and ordered post-termination visitation, in part, because terminating only the mother's custodial rights would leave the mother with standing to modify the disposition.

On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the circuit court erred because it had not followed the procedure established by Rule 34, a rule governing objections to a child's case plan, and because it had not adequately determined and considered the girl's wishes. On remand, the Supreme Court directed the circuit court to comply with Rule 34 and to determine the girl's wishes concerning the termination of her mother's parental rights.

In her dissenting opinion, Justice Workman noted that the guardian ad litem and the mother's counsel had not considered the concept of post-termination visitation. She also noted that the guardian ad litem, even though she had not used the correct terminology, had expressed the child's wishes very clearly and that the judge's disposition, termination of parental rights with an award of post-termination visitation, had taken the girl's wishes into account. Justice Workman further noted that relevant statutory provision, West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(C), requires a court to consider a child's wishes, but does not control the court's ultimate decision.

H. Adult Rights and Children Rights

Mother appealed termination of her parental rights to her son, Jeffrey D. After reviewing the record, we reversed the termination order and remanded the case to the lower court to consider fashioning a meaningful improvement period and ultimately to determine whether it is in the best interest of Jeffrey to be returned to his mother's custody.

Regardless of the eventual disposition of the parent's rights, the reality of the child's life, including the fact that he may have lived for several years in foster care, cannot be ignored. "Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren). Thus, how Jeffrey has fared educationally and emotionally with these foster parents and Jeffrey's own feelings and emotional attachments should be taken into consideration by the lower court." 461 S.E.2d at 142.

The termination of parental rights was upheld in case of infant where schizophrenic mother failed to provide proper food and shelter.

The mother was not entitled to improvement period prior to termination of parental rights where the mother did not make request for improvement period until the final hearing to terminate parental rights approximately 14 months after the initial temporary custody order was entered.

In re Carolyn Jean T., 181 W. Va. 383, 382 S.E.2d 577 (1989) (per curiam)

Where the mother had been released from treatment prior to entry of final order terminating parental rights, due process would preclude termination of her parental rights because of inability or unwillingness to seek treatment for her mental illness unless the DHS put into evidence the results of the treatment which was eventually forced upon her. The case was remanded for further evidentiary development.

Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a).

However, the Court has refused to adopt a blanket rule that parental rights must be terminated to all the children residing in the home based merely on the finding that one child has been abused. Instead, there must be clear and convincing evidence that the child's "health or welfare is harmed or threatened" by the conditions existing in the home. The circuit court must make a specific and independent finding of fact or conclusion of law that the other siblings were abused or would be at risk of being abused in order to terminate parental rights based upon the abuse of another child in the home. Of course, evidence of the abuse of one child is certainly relevant and probative to the issue of a parent's capacity to protect other siblings from abuse or the capacity of a parent not to abuse the other children in the home.

In making its ultimate determination as to disposition of a child whose sibling has been abused, the circuit court should take into consideration both the evidence of the abuse of the other child, the possible reluctance of the sibling if returned home to notify anyone of abuse; and, the likelihood that a parent would not defend the sibling from further abuse and whether the parent is so deficient in the basic parental instinct to protect the child that determination of rights to siblings can be justified on that basis alone.

K. To Knowingly Allow Abusive Conduct

Note: This type of abuse is commonly referred to as "failure to protect," and the parent is referred to as a "nonprotecting parent." These common terms, however, do not accurately paraphrase the statutory definition. West Virginia Code § 49-1-201 defines this type of abuse as occurring when a parent, guardian or custodian "knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home . . .." The cases listed below indicate that this type of abuse involves more than a failure to protect. Rather, this type of abuse involves a scenario in which the parent knows of the abuse and allows it by either failing to take any protective action or by aiding or protecting the abuser. One of these cases, In the Interest of Betty J.W., addresses the application of this definition in a case involving domestic violence. Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code has established a definition of a "battered parent" and expressly allows the court to consider the effect of domestic violence in abuse and neglect cases. For a discussion of this issue, see Special Procedures Section I. Principal Abuse and Neglect Definitions.

W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq.

Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.

Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

Where there is clear and convincing proof that (1) these injuries occurred in the sole presence of a parent, and (2) the explanations of both parents are contrary to the medical evidence, and (3) both parents fail to acknowledge that any abuse and neglect occurred, the circuit court is in error for failing to terminate the parental rights.

Syl. Pt. 8, W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996)

A parent's parental rights to his/her child(ren) may be terminated: 1) where there is clear and convincing evidence that the parent knowingly allowed another person to inflict extensive physical injury upon another child residing in the same home as the parent and his/er child(ren), even though the injured child is not the parent's natural or adopted child; and 2) where there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parent, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, has taken no action to identify the abuser.

Syl. Pt. 3, In the Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988)

W. Va. Code § 49-1-201

W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.

The circuit court terminated the parental rights of a father for sexually abusing his seventeen year old daughter. It also terminated the mother's rights for failure to protect. The Supreme Court, however, reversed the circuit court because the record did not support the conclusion that the mother had knowingly allowed the sexual abuse. The Supreme Court relied on the fact that the mother, a domestic violence victim, had reported the abuse as soon as she could get away from her husband and had requested services, including another residence. The Supreme Court further relied on the fact that the mother had intervened when her husband attempted to sexually abuse his daughter, and her husband had beaten her and threatened her with a knife.

L. Where Abandonment of the Child by Either or Both Biological Parents is Alleged and Proven

Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. W. Va. DHHR and Chastity D. v. Hill, 207 W. Va. 358, 532 S.E.2d 358 (2000)

In a child abuse and neglect proceeding where abandonment of the child by either or both biological parents is alleged and proven, the circuit court should decide in the dispositional phase of the proceeding whether to terminate any or all parental rights to the child. Before making that decision, even where there are written relinquishments of parental rights, the circuit court is required to conduct a disposition hearing, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 and Rules 33 and 35 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, at which the issue of such termination is specifically and thoroughly addressed.

A conviction of . . . murder of a child's mother by his father and the father's prolonged incarceration in a penal institution for that conviction are significant factors to be considered in ascertaining the father's fitness and in determining whether the father's parental rights should be terminated.

N. Intellectual Incapacity of Parents

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Billy Joe M., 206 W. Va. 1, 521 S.E.2d 173 (1999)

Where allegations of neglect are made against parents based on intellectual incapacity of such parent(s) and their consequent inability to adequately care for their children, termination of rights should occur only after the social services system makes a thorough effort to determine whether the parent(s) can adequately care for the children with intensive long-term assistance. In such case, however, the determination of whether the parents can function with such assistance should be made as soon as possible in order to maximize the child(ren)'s chances for a permanent placement. Where the charge is abuse as opposed to neglect, the obligation to provide remedial services is far less substantial.

After 14 months of services, the parental rights of the respondent mother were terminated and her request for a dispositional improvement period was denied based upon a finding that there was "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future." Evidence elicited at the final hearing showed that the mother who had a full-scale IQ of 50 did not make sufficient improvements to her parenting skills. Further, the sum of the evidence received supported DHHR's position that the mother would need twenty-four hour a day services to make reunification between her and her special needs child possible. Finally, there was a credible concern that the mother would not protect the child from her sexually abusive father. The mother failed to acknowledge the previous instances of sexual abuse and did not appear to recognize the risk the father continued to pose to the child.

The Supreme Court found that Billy Joe M. does not require the DHHR to provide permanent, round the clock services to a respondent parent. Further, the Court reiterated that when there is evidence of abuse as opposed to neglect, "the obligation to provide remedial services is far less substantial."

O. Parents with Terminal Illness

Syl. Pt. 2, In the Interest of Micah Alyn R., 202 W. Va. 400, 504 S.E.2d 635 (1998)

When a parent is unable to properly care for a child due to the parent's terminal illness, so that conditions which would constitute neglect of the child occur and continue to be threatened, termination of parental rights, without consent, is contrary to public policy, even though there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect will be substantially corrected in the future. In such circumstances, a circuit court should ordinarily postpone or defer any decision on termination of parental rights. However, such deference on the parental rights termination issue does not require a circuit court to postpone or defer decisions on custody or other issues properly before the court. In fact, efforts towards locating prospective adoptive parents shall be made so long as every measure is taken to foster and maintain the bond and ongoing relationship between the parent and child.

P. Parents - Failure to Acknowledge Problem In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997)

"In Doris, this Court stated that, for a parent to remedy the problem of abuse and neglect, the problem must first be acknowledged." 475 S.E.2d at 874. Here, the medical evidence notwithstanding, the respondents deny that any abuse or neglect occurred and have refused to sign the family case plan because of its indication that there may have been "conditions and circumstances" in the home adverse to the safety and well-being of Taylor B. Such conduct on the part of the parents, however, renders those conditions and circumstances untreatable. Even if the respondents go through parenting classes and counseling, in the absence of recognition by a parent that child abuse has occurred, the child remains at risk and it is not safe to return the child. Where the respondents do not acknowledge that any abuse or neglect has occurred, it is reversible error to fail to terminate parental rights.

W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996)

Silence goes to the heart of the treatability question essential in these cases. In order to remedy a problem, it must first be acknowledged and failure to admit allegations makes the problem untreatable. It makes an improvement period an exercise in futility at child's expense.

In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W. Va. 20, 459 S.E.2d 131 (1995)

Where a parent fails to acknowledge responsibility for the child's injuries or neglect, then the issue cannot be addressed and worked on during an improvement period. Accordingly, the parent is unable to demonstrate that a level of functioning has been improved to the point that the safety of the child could be insured. 459 S.E.2d at 135-36, 138.

In re Tonjia M., 212 W. Va. 443, 573 S.E.2d 354 (2002) (per curiam)

In a case involving sexual abuse allegations, the circuit court denied the respondent father's motion for an improvement period because he failed to admit to the sexual abuse of his daughter. The circuit court noted that counseling without an admission would be ineffective. Relying on W. Va. DHHR v. Doris S., the Court affirmed the denial of the improvement period and subsequent termination of parental rights.

In re Timber M., 231 W. Va. 44, 743 S.E.2d 352 (2013) (per curiam)

An eight-year old girl told her mother that her stepfather was showing her pornographic movies, that he exposed himself to her and that he attempted to make her watch him masturbate. In response, the mother taught the girl now to make an audio recording with a cell phone and encouraged the girl to be alone with her stepfather in the hopes that she would be able to record another incident of sexual abuse. The mother and her children continued to live with the stepfather for a period of four months, during which time the mother convinced the stepfather to convey his farm to her. The facts also indicate that the mother had left the children alone with him during this time. After four months, the mother contacted law enforcement to report the sexual abuse and to report that she could not get the stepfather to leave the home. The stepfather confessed to the abuse, and the eight-year old also disclosed the abuse during a forensic interview. In turn, the Department filed an abuse and neglect petition against the mother based upon her actions -- sending her daughter to record an additional incident of abuse and leaving her children alone with their stepfather after knowing of the abuse.

The mother originally planned to stipulate to the petition, but refused to do so on the day of the adjudicatory hearing. After conducting a contested adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court denied the mother's motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period because the mother had failed to admit to any problem. In fact, a forensic psychiatrist testified that she did not believe that her actions constituted abuse and that she actually believed that she was justified in her actions. After denying the motion for an improvement period, the court conducted a disposition hearing and terminated the mother's parental rights because she failed to recognize that she did not protect her children and that she did not have the capacity to recognize and remedy this failure. Affirming the circuit court ruling, the Supreme Court held that the mother "demonstrated an intractable unwillingness and inability to acknowledge her culpability in this matter, to accept the services offered by the Department, and to protect her children in the future." 743 S.E.2d at 365.

In re S.W., 233 W. Va. 91, 755 S.E.2d 8 (2014)(per curiam)

The respondent father had been previously convicted of the manslaughter of his infant daughter in Maryland. Throughout the criminal and abuse and neglect cases, the father's wife, Jamie W., remained married to him.

When their second child, S.W., was born, the DHHR filed an aggravated circumstances petition based upon the prior conviction. Although the father had confessed to the offense, pled guilty in the criminal case, and served time for the offense, he did not acknowledge his responsibility in the older child's death in the course of the abuse and neglect case. Rather, he claimed that the child's death was caused by mistakes made by hospital personnel. The respondent mother also attributed the child's death to mistakes made by hospital personnel. Although the circuit court originally denied the respondent father's motion for an improvement period, the circuit court ultimately ordered the DHHR to implement a visitation plan that would result in the reunification of S.W. with his father. The circuit court relied on the fact that there was no evidence of present unfitness. During the course of the case, the circuit court also found the mother to be a nonoffending parent at the request of counsel for the DHHR and the respondent mother. The guardian ad litem did not object to this finding.

See W. Va. Code § 49-4-605

On an appeal filed by the DHHR and the guardian ad litem, the Supreme Court held that the circuit court committed reversible error when it did not terminate the father's parental rights. The Supreme Court relied upon both the death of the older child and the father's refusal to acknowledge the abuse that caused the death.

The Supreme Court further noted its deep concern about S.W.'s mother because she did not appear to be committed to preventing the father from having contact with the younger child, S.W. Consequently, the Court directed the DHHR to continue to monitor the case to ensure S.W.'s safety upon remand.

Q. Incarcerated Parents

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Cecil T., 228 W. Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011)

When no factors and circumstances other than incarceration are raised at a disposition hearing in a child abuse and neglect proceeding with regard to a parent's ability to remedy the condition of abuse and neglect in the near future, the circuit court shall evaluate whether the best interests of a child are served by terminating the rights of the biological parent in light of the evidence before it. This would necessarily include but not be limited to consideration of the nature of the offense for which the parent is incarcerated, the terms of the confinement, and the length of the incarceration in light of the abused or neglected child's best interests and paramount need for permanency, security, stability and continuity.

In this case, the mother's parental rights had been terminated in a previous abuse and neglect case. The father was incarcerated for a federal firearms violation, possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. Except for a very brief period in which he had resided with his father, the child had lived with his foster parents throughout his young life. At disposition, the circuit court declined to terminate the father's parental rights and instead ordered the less restrictive alternative afforded by the relevant statute which involved placing or maintaining the child in the temporary custody of the DHHR. The circuit court did so because it would allow the father to regain custody if he could demonstrate the fitness to exercise his parental rights in the future. The circuit court also named the foster parents as guardians of the child. Both the guardian ad litem and the foster parents who had been granted intervenor status joined the DHHR in this appeal.

In its opinion, the Supreme Court reversed the circuit court and held that the incarceration of a parent could serve as a basis for the termination of parental rights and consideration should be given to the nature of the offense, the terms of confinement and the length of the incarceration. In addition, the Court noted that dicta from In re Brian James D., 550 S.E.2d 73 (W. Va. 2001) was unsound because it had incorrectly summarized the holding of State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 174 S.E.2d 742 (W. Va. 1970). The Court went on to clarify that incarceration may serve as a basis to terminate parental rights and that the factors set forth in Syllabus Point Three should be considered when a circuit court determines whether to do so.

Syl. Pt. 7, In re Emily B., 208 W. Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Brian James D., 209 W. Va. 537, 550 S.E.2d 73 (2001)

A natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses.

R. Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights to a Sibling

In the Matter of George Glen B., Jr., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999)

Syl. Pt. 2: Where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the statutory provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12. Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) is present.

W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-605(a)(3)

Syl. Pt. 4: When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3); prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s). See Syl. Pt. 2, In re J.C., 232 W. Va. 81, 750 S.E.2d 634 (2013).

Syl. Pt. 5: Where an abuse and neglect petition is filed based on prior involuntary termination(s) of parental rights to a sibling, if such prior involuntary termination(s) involved neglect or non-aggravated abuse, the parent(s) may meet the statutory standard for receiving an improvement period with appropriate conditions, and the court may direct the Department of Health and Human Resources to make reasonable efforts to reunify the parent(s) and child. Under these circumstances, the court should give due consideration to the types of remedial measures in which the parent(s) participated or are currently participating and whether the circumstances leading to the prior involuntary termination(s) have been remedied.

Where there was aggravated abuse, however, such as the murder or serious injury of a sibling, the court may be justified in ordering termination without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives. See Syl. Pt. 2, In re R.J.M., 266 S.E.2d 114 (W. Va. 1980).

Syl. Pt. 1: When the parental rights of a parent to a child have been involuntarily terminated, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a petition, to join in a petition, or to otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding, to terminate parental rights as to any sibling(s) of that child.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-605(a)(3)

Syl. Pt. 2: While the Department of Health and Human Resources has a duty to file, join or participate in proceedings to terminate parental rights in the circumstances listed in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3), the Department must still comply with the evidentiary standards established by the Legislature in W. Va. Code § 49-6-2 before a court may terminate parental rights to a child, and must comply with the evidentiary standards established in W. Va. Code § 49-6-3 before a court may grant the Department the authority to take emergency, temporary custody of a child.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601

W. Va. Code § 49-4-602

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i)

Syl. Pt. 5: The presence of one of the factors outlined in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) merely lowers the threshold of evidence necessary for the termination of parental rights. W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) does not mandate that a circuit court terminate parental rights merely upon the filing of a petition filed pursuant to the statute, and the Department of Health and Human Resources continues to bear the burden of proving that the subject child is abused or neglected pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-2.

In re Rebecca K.C., 213 W. Va. 230, 579 S.E.2d 718 (2003)

In this case involving a prior involuntary termination, the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the respondent mother's motion for an improvement period and the termination of her parental rights, under the particular facts. However, the Court noted: "We emphatically reiterate that a prior termination does not mean that a parent does not have the right to 'another chance' in the form of an improvement period or otherwise." 579 S.E.2d at 723.

In re J.C., 232 W. Va. 81, 750 S.E.2d 634 (2013)

This per curiam opinion addressed whether a mother had remedied the circumstances which had led to the prior involuntary termination of her parental rights to three older children. As a beginning point for its analysis, the Court observed that the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family in cases involving the prior termination of parental rights. The Court also noted that the lower court had conducted two evidentiary hearings and had found that the prior circumstances had not been remedied. Specifically, the circuit court had expressed concern about the mother's lack of income. Apparently, the mother had sent her older children out to beg, and one of them was sexually assaulted. The circuit court had also found that the mother had not resolved her drug issues, and had not participated in significant substance abuse counseling, even though the mother had presented evidence of several weeks of clean drug screens. After reviewing the record, the Supreme Court affirmed the ruling that denied the mother's request for an improvement period and terminated her parental rights because deference should be given to the circuit court findings and conclusions and because the evidence "must be examined under a reduced minimum threshold given the mother's prior involuntary termination." J.C., 750 S.E.2d at 643.

S. Substance Abuse

In re Aaron Thomas M., 212 W. Va. 604, 575 S.E.2d 214 (2002)

The Supreme Court affirmed the termination of the respondent mother's parental rights because of her substance abuse and failure to comply with a reasonable family case plan and rehabilitative efforts.

In re Dejah Rose P., 216 W. Va. 514, 607 S.E.2d 843 (2004)

In this per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination of parental rights because the respondent mother had failed to respond to treatment at least three times and the completion of her current drug treatment program was uncertain. The Court noted that "In terms of drug abuse or drug addiction, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5, contemplates an inquiry into the parent's past conduct as well as the parent's prognosis." 607 S.E.2d at 848.

T. Domestic Violence

D.H.S. v. Tammy B., 180 W. Va. 295, 376 S.E.2d 309 (1988) (per curiam)

In an appeal of a termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court noted that the children's exposure to domestic violence, as well as other factors such as sexual abuse, constituted sufficient grounds to terminate parental rights.

XVII. RELINQUISHMENT OF PARENTAL RIGHTS

A. Relinquishment Associated with Adoption, Not Abandonment

Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W. Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198 (1997)

A parent's relinquishment of his/her parental rights either in anticipation of future adoption proceedings or as a part of previously initiated adoption proceedings does not constitute abandonment for abuse and neglect purposes.

B. No Adoption During Pendency of Proceedings

Alonzo v. Jacqueline F., 191 W. Va. 248, 445 S.E.2d 189 (1994)

Syl. Pt. 1: W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), which deals with the disposition by a court of a case involving a neglected or abused child, provides, in part: "no adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final."

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)

Syl. Pt. 2: Where a child abuse and neglect proceeding has been filed against a parent, such parent may not confer any rights on a third party by executing a consent to adopt during the pendency of the proceeding.

C. Voluntary Relinquishment of Parental Rights

In re James G., 211 W. Va. 339, 566 S.E.2d 226 (2002)

During a dispositional hearing, a mother attempted to voluntarily relinquish her rights to her children. The circuit court refused to accept the voluntary termination over DHHR's objection because it would force DHHR to accept a settlement, not because an involuntary termination was in the best interests of the children. Reversing the circuit court, the Supreme Court held:

Syl. Pt. 3: In the context of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a court may accept a parent's voluntary relinquishment of parental rights without the consent of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, provided that the agreement meets the requirements of W. Va. Code § 49-6-7, where applicable, and the relevant provisions of the Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-607

Syl. Pt. 4: A circuit court has discretion in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a proffered voluntary termination of parental rights, or to reject it and proceed to a decision on involuntary termination. Such discretion must be exercised after an independent review of all relevant factors, and the court is not obliged to adopt any position advocated by the Department of Health and Human Resources.

Note: For a complete discussion of this case and the modification of dispositional orders, see Section XIV. H.

Seven months after a mother had voluntarily relinquished her rights to her son, she sought reunification by moving to modify the dispositional order. The circuit court held that she lacked standing to modify the dispositional order pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-7 because she could no longer be considered the child's parent. She then moved to withdraw the relinquishment, but the circuit court concluded that she had failed to prove that she had been subject to fraud or duress. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the circuit court and held that the mother lacked standing because she had lost her status as a parent through the voluntary relinquishment. With regard to the legal effect of a voluntary relinquishment on parental rights, the Court adopted the following syllabus points:

W. Va. Code § 49-4-607

Syl. Pt. 3: W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 permits a parent to voluntarily relinquish his/her parental rights. Such voluntary relinquishment is valid pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 if the relinquishment is made by "a duly acknowledged writing" and is "entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud."

Syl. Pt. 5: A valid voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, effectuated in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-7, includes a relinquishment of "rights to participate in the decisions affecting a minor child," W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o), and causes the person relinquishing his/her parental rights to lose his/her status as a parent of that child.

Syl. Pt. 9, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Marley M., 231 W. Va. 534, 745 S.E.2d 572 (2013)

In an abuse and neglect case, the offer of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights does not obviate the statutory requirements regarding the necessity for proceeding with the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of the abuse and neglect case. Prior to accepting an offer of voluntary termination of parental rights, a reviewing court must conduct the hearings required by West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-2 and 49-6-5.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604

For a complete discussion of this case, see Section XIV. B.

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Marley M., 231 W. Va. 534, 745 S.E.2d 572 (2013)

Where during the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a parent offers to voluntarily relinquish his or her parental rights and such relinquishment is accepted by the circuit court, such relinquishment may, without further evidence, be used as the basis of an order of adjudication of abuse and neglect by that parent of his or her children.

At the outset of an adjudicatory hearing, a respondent mother tendered a voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights. The circuit court, therefore, did not conduct an adjudicatory or disposition hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court addressed the effects of a voluntary relinquishment in light of the holding of In re T.W., 737 S.E.2d 69 (W. Va. 2012), a case which requires a court to conduct adjudicatory and disposition hearings before accepting a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights. The Court observed that an adult respondent's silence as a response to a civil abuse and neglect petition may properly be considered as evidence of culpability. See W. Va. DHHR ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 475 S.E.2d 865 (W. Va. 1996); In re Daniel D., 562 S.E.2d 147 (W. Va. 2002). Based upon this precedent, the Court held that a parent's voluntary relinquishment may serve as a basis for an adjudication order. The Court explained that its ruling "preserve[s] the utility of voluntary relinquishments during an abuse and neglect proceeding for both an accused parent and the State. All options are still on the table for an accused parent; he or she now simply faces the import of his choices." 745 S.E.2d at 581. A court may, therefore, use a voluntary relinquishment as a basis for an adjudication order without requiring the presentation of additional evidence.

D. Oral Relinquishments

In re Tessla N.M., 211 W. Va. 334, 566 S.E.2d 221 (2002)

At a review hearing, a mother orally relinquished her parental rights and never submitted a written relinquishment. On appeal, the mother challenged the validity of the oral relinquishment because it failed to meet the requirement that a relinquishment be written as established by West Virginia Code § 49-6-7. Reconciling West Virginia Code § 49-6-7 and Rule 35(a)(1) of West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, the West Virginia Supreme Court held:

W. Va. Code § 49-4-607

Syl. Pt. 1: Pursuant to Rule 35(a)(1) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, an oral voluntary relinquishment of parental rights is valid if the parent who chooses to relinquish is present in court and the court determines that the parent understands the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is aware of less drastic alternatives than termination, and is informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

Syl. Pt. 2: An oral voluntary relinquishment of parental rights made on the record in open court is valid regardless of whether the parent who chooses to terminate his or her rights executes and submits a duly acknowledged writing pursuant to W. Va. § 49-6-7.

E. Parents' Right to Revoke Relinquishment

W. Va. DHS v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W. Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985)

Where child has spent substantial period of time at the home of foster parents, pending a ruling by trial court on whether to approve minor parent's relinquishment of custody to licensed private child welfare agency or to DHS, best interest of child must be given primary importance by trial court; in such case, minor parent's right to revoke relinquishment ceases to be absolute, due to passage of unreasonable period of time.

Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Rose L. v. Pancake, 209 W. Va. 188, 544 S.E.2d 403 (2001)

Under the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-6-7, a circuit court may conduct a hearing to determine whether the signing by a parent of an agreement relinquishing parental rights was free from duress and fraud.

XVIII. ACHIEVEMENT OF PERMANENCY

A. Permanency Hearing

Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 227 W. Va. 184, 706 S.E.2d 381 (2011)

Issuing a writ of prohibition, the Supreme Court held that the circuit court exceeded its legitimate powers when it refused to allow foster parents to participate in a permanency hearing for a child who had resided with them for 22 months. The Court pointed out that the notice and an opportunity to be heard at the permanency hearing to foster parents, pre-adoptive parents and relatives who are providing care for a child are entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard with respect to the permanency hearing. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-608.

B. Time Period for Achievement of Permanency

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Cecil T., 228 W. Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011)

Note: Amended after the decision in Cecil T., Rule 43 provides that permanent placement of a child must be achieved within 12 months of the entry of the final disposition order unless there are extraordinary reasons justifying the delay.

The eighteen-month period provided in Rule 43 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedures for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings for permanent placement of an abused and neglected child following the final dispositional order must be strictly followed except in the most extraordinary circumstances which are fully substantiated in the record.

Although a father was incarcerated for a conviction of a federal firearms offense, the circuit court did not terminate his parental rights and instead ordered that the father could, at an unspecified time in the future, regain custody upon a showing of parental fitness. The circuit court named the child's foster parents as his guardians, and left legal custody with the DHHR. The circuit court relied on West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) as a less restrictive alternative to the termination of parental rights. The DHHR, the guardian ad litem and the foster parents who had been granted intervenor status all appealed this ruling.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(5)

In Syllabus Point Three, the Supreme Court held that incarceration could, in fact, serve as a basis to terminate parental rights and that the nature of the offense, the terms of confinement and the length of the sentence should be considered "in light of the abused or neglected child's best interests and paramount need for permanency, security, stability and continuity." It, therefore, reversed the circuit court.

As an additional basis for overruling the circuit court, the Supreme Court noted that the circuit court had created the same type of timeliness problems that had been proscribed by In re Emily, 540 S.E.2d 542 (W. Va. 2000), a case in which the circuit court had delayed the onset of improvement periods until the mother completed a lengthy drug rehabilitation program and the father was released from incarceration. The Court expressly stated that it found "no provision anywhere in the abuse and neglect statutes giving courts discretion to create what the lower court termed a 'limbo period' where a permanency plan for an abused or neglected child may be placed on hold indefinitely." The Court further stated that the eighteen-month period for achieving permanency established by Rule 43 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings is "not a mere suggestion, but a standard to which courts should faithfully and routinely adhere except in the most extraordinary or unusual circumstances." This reasoning served as the basis for the adoption of Syllabus Point 6, quoted above.

The Supreme Court overturned a circuit court order that declined to terminate the mother's parental rights and, instead, ordered an unspecified period of temporary custody with the Department. With regard to the importance of permanency, the Court expressly stated that:

> These children are entitled to and deserve permanent placements and the opportunity to grow up in loving homes, free from the abuses heaped on them during their short lives. The circuit court's order deprives the children of the permanency they need, want, deserve and are entitled to have. 712 S.E.2d at 68.

C. Adoptive Home - Preferred Permanent Placement

State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998)

Syl. Pt. 2: Where parental rights have been terminated pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), and it is necessary to remove the abused and/or neglected child from his or her family, an adoptive home is the preferred permanent out-of-home placement of the child.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6)

Syl. Pt. 3: In determining the appropriate permanent out-of-home placement of a child under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), the circuit court shall give priority to securing a suitable adoptive home for the child and shall consider other placement alternatives, including permanent foster care, only where the court finds that adoption would not provide custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline consistent with the child's best interests or where a suitable adoptive home can not be found.

In re Michael S., Jr., 218 W. Va. 1, 620 S.E.2d 141 (2005)

In this per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of an intervenor who sought to be considered as an adoptive parent. The Supreme Court noted the intervenor's failure to complete a home study and a psychological evaluation, her lack of participation in the court proceedings, and the lack of a bond between her and the child.

D. Adoption By Unmarried Persons

State ex rel. Kutil v. Blake, 223 W. Va. 711, 679 S.E.2d 130 (2009)

Following the termination of the rights of both biological parents, the circuit court held a permanency review hearing to discuss the permanency plan for eleven month old B.G.C. The child's guardian ad litem renewed his "Motion to Order DHHR to Remove Child from Physical Placement in Homosexual Home and Other Injunctive Relief." DHHR, who had previously supported adoption by one or both foster parents, changed its recommendation and asked the court to remove the child because the foster parents' home was over capacity. The circuit court ordered that the child should be placed in a "traditional home" with a mother and a father. The foster parents sought a writ of prohibition in the Supreme Court to prevent the removal of B.G.C. from their home.

Addressing the respondent and GAL's assertion that there is a legislative preference in the adoption statute, the Supreme Court stated:

> Although Respondent recognized that each Petitioner may individually petition to adopt under the statute, he asserts in his brief that the "statutes indicate a preference for adoption by married couples." No statutory citation was supplied to support this position and our research reveals no such stated preference. Nor were we able to locate any legislatively assigned preference for adoption into a traditional home or any statutory definition of a traditional home for adoption purposes. As is evident from the clear language of West Virginia Code § 48-22-201, there is no prioritization among the three classifications of those eligible to adopt a child in this state. "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 65 S.E.2d 488 (W. Va. 1951).
> Notwithstanding Respondent's and GAL's suggestions to the contrary, there simply is no legislative differentiation between categories of eligible candidates for adoption under the terms of West Virginia Code § 48-22-201. Such policy determination is clearly a legislative prerogative, outside of the purview of the courts. The primary concern of courts in adoption cases is whether there is evidence that the recommended adoptive home possesses the necessary attributes to meet the individual and specific needs of the child both at present and in the future. 679 S.E.2d at 320.

E. Preferred Placement - With Siblings

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Shanee Carol B., 209 W. Va. 658, 550 S.E.2d 636 (2001)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-111(e)

W. Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) provides for a "sibling preference" wherein the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources is to place a child who is in the department's custody with the foster or adoptive parent(s) of the child's sibling or siblings, where the foster or adoptive parents seek the care and custody of the child, and the department determines (1) the fitness of the persons seeking to enter into a foster care or adoption arrangement which would unite or reunite the siblings, and (2) placement of the child with his or her siblings is in the best interests of the children. In any proceedings brought by the department to maintain separation of siblings, such separation may be ordered only if the circuit court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the department's determination. Upon review by the circuit court of the department's determination to unite a child with his or her siblings, such determination shall be disregarded only where the circuit court finds, by clear and convincing evidence, that the persons with whom the department seeks to place the child are unfit or that placement of the child with his or her siblings is not in the best interests of one or all of the children.

F. Preferred Placement – Grandparents

W. Va. Code § 49-4-114(a)(3)

West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the Department find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child.

Syl. Pt. 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Aaron H., 229 W. Va. 677, 735 S.E.2d 274 (2012)

By specifying in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case.

Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005)

In this case, a two-month old child was physically abused by his father. Subsequent to the termination of parental rights, the paternal grandparents attempted to be considered as adoptive parents. In an administrative proceeding, the Department found that the grandparents were not suitable adoptive parents because they had difficulty acknowledging their son's culpability. The grandparents appealed to the Kanawha Circuit Court which affirmed the Department's decision. The Supreme Court, however, reversed the circuit court, and recognized the statutory preference for grandparents. With regard to this statutory preference, the Court further held that an analysis of the best interests of the child is implicitly included when the statutory preference is applied.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-114(a)(3)

In this per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court explained the parameters on the grandparent preference for an adoptive placement established by West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3). The Court expressly stated that: "[T]he adoptive placement of the subject child with his/her grandparents must serve the child's best interests. Absent such a finding, adoptive placement with the child's grandparents is not proper." 696 S.E.2d at 302. Based upon this reasoning, the Court concluded that the statutory preference is not absolute. Because the record in the case indicated that the circuit court may have treated the preference as absolute, the case was remanded for reconsideration and for a determination as to whether the proposed adoptive placement with the grandparents would serve the children's best interests.

This case involved a dispute between a young child's foster parents with whom he had been placed for three years and a maternal grandmother who had an approved home study. The child had been removed from his mother's care when he was 17 months old because of her illegal drug use and the child's exposure to domestic violence. When the DHHR first became aware of the mother's drug use, the child was placed with his maternal grandmother. After this initial placement, the DHHR learned that the grandmother's husband regularly used marijuana and alcohol and engaged in acts of domestic violence against the grandmother. To provide for the child's safety, the DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition and named the child's biological parents, the maternal grandmother and her husband as adult respondents. At this point, the child was placed with his foster parents and remained there until the circuit court placed him with his maternal grandmother once she obtained a favorable home study.

After he was removed from her care, the child's grandmother requested a home study. She was not, however, approved because of her husband's substance abuse and acts of domestic violence. She and her husband were dismissed as respondents to the abuse and neglect case because they were no longer considered a possible placement for the child. While the abuse and neglect case was pending, the child's biological parents both relinquished their parental rights.

In response to the failed home study, the grandmother divorced her husband and ultimately requested another home study. This time, the grandmother's home study was approved.

After the home study was approved, the DHHR requested that the circuit court place Hunter H. with his maternal grandmother based upon the statutory grandparent preference set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3). The circuit court granted this request over the objections of the guardian ad litem and the foster parents who had been allowed to intervene. Although they requested a stay, the circuit court ordered the child to be placed immediately with his grandmother.

Holding that the circuit court erred, the Supreme Court found that the circuit court "elevated the grandparent preference over the best interests of the child." The Supreme Court noted that the child was part of a stable, loving home and had been for three years. Also, the Court noted that an approved home study alone should not determine what is in a child's best interests. The Court further ruled that the immediate change in custody from the foster parents to the maternal grandmother was contrary to case law. Citing cases that provide for a gradual transition of custody, the Supreme Court directed the circuit court to conduct a full hearing to determine how the child should be returned to his foster parents' home.

In this per curiam opinion, the child's paternal grandfather claimed that the court erred by placing the child for adoption with his foster parents instead of with him in view of the statutory preference for grandparent placement. Affirming the circuit court, the Supreme Court noted that the child was 18 months old when the petition was filed and, at the time of the appeal, was almost five years old. Additionally, the Supreme Court pointed out that the grandfather had extremely limited contact with the child both before the case and while it was pending. Finally, the Court noted that the grandfather was partially at fault for the failure to complete the home study.

The Court concluded that:

> [T]he grandparent preference must be tempered by a court's consideration of the child's best interests. If on balance, the grandparent placement fails to serve the best interests of the child, the child may be placed elsewhere. 735 S.E.2d at 280.

In re L.M., 235 W. Va. 436, 774 S.E.2d 517 (2015)

This case began when a three-year old boy, L.M., was removed from his parents' custody as a result of chronic substance abuse, which included exposure to drug paraphernalia and a clandestine methamphetamine lab. The meth lab was located in the mother's trailer, a home that her parents had bought for her. Originally, L.M. was placed in foster care, but the maternal grandparents moved to intervene and also requested that he be placed in their home. Over the DHHR's objection, the court placed L.M. in the physical custody of his grandparents. The court did not, however, grant the grandparents' motion to intervene.

Shortly thereafter, L.M.'s sister, L.S., was born, and she had substantial amounts of alcohol in her system and trace amounts of controlled substances. She was also placed in the physical custody of her grandparents. On an unannounced visit, the DHHR took photographs and discovered that the grandparents had baby items, a bassinet and baby swing, from the meth-contaminated home. The DHHR requested and was granted emergency custody of the two children, and placed them in foster care. The court conducted a full evidentiary hearing and found that the grandparents were using items from the meth-contaminated home. Testimony at the hearing indicated that meth residue on household items could result in adverse health effects. The court found that the foster care placement should continue.

During the course of the case, the court terminated the adult respondents' parental rights, and permanent placement of the children became the contested issue. The grandparents had requested a home study, which the DHHR began. Approximately seven months after the court conducted the initial hearing on the removal of the children from the grandparents' home, the court conducted another evidentiary hearing on the grandparents' motion to intervene and motion for placement of the children. Denying both motions, the circuit court based its findings on the presence of the meth-contaminated items in the grandparents' home, the grandparents' support of their adult children, who have issues with drugs and crime, and the failure to prevent interaction between the children and their biological mother. The circuit court also considered the children's need for the continuity of care and caretakers. The court ruled on the placement of the children before the grandparents' home study had been completed.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-114(a)(3)

One of the grandparents' assignments of error involved the application of the grandparent preference statute, then codified at West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3). Specifically, the grandparents argued that the court failed to apply the statutory presumption that favors placement with grandparents, and they also argued that the court erred by deciding on placement of the children before the home study had been completed.

After analyzing the language of the grandparent preference statute, the Court concluded that it imposes a mandatory duty on the Department to conduct a home study when a grandparent expresses interest in placement. In a new syllabus point, the Court held that:

> The mandatory language of W. Va. Code § 49–3–1(a)(3) requires that a home study evaluation be conducted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to determine if any interested grandparent would be a suitable adoptive parent. Syl. Pt. 9, In re L.M., 774 S.E.2d 517 (W. Va. 2015).

Although the grandparent preference statute requires the Department to conduct a home study, the Court observed that the interpretation of the statute would not control the resolution of the case. Rather, the Court found that the best interests of the children should determine their permanent placement. Despite the statutory language requiring the Department to conduct a home study, the Court determined that the statute would not require completion of a home study if a grandparent is found to be unsuitable adoptive placement. In a second new syllabus point, the Court held that:

> While the grandparent preference statute, at W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3), places a mandatory duty on the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to complete a home study before a child may be placed for adoption with an interested grandparent, "the department shall first consider the [grandparent's] suitability and willingness ... to adopt the child." There is no statutory requirement that a home study be completed in the event that the interested grandparent is found to be an unsuitable adoptive placement and that placement with such grandparent is not in the best interests of the child. Syl. Pt. 10, In re L.M., 774 S.E.2d 517.

Syl. Pt. 6, In re N.A., 227 W. Va. 458, 711 S.E.2d 280 (2011)

A psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In re Brandon L.E., 183 W. Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990), that case is expressly modified." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005).

In addition to the mother, the maternal grandparents of the four children were subject to abuse and neglect proceedings related to their caretaking of the children. When the initial petition was filed, the circuit court only found probable cause of abuse and neglect with regard to the mother and not the grandparents. Accordingly, the circuit court placed the children in the grandparents' custody. As the case progressed, the DHHR discovered that the grandparents were allowing the mother to visit with the children at unauthorized times. Additionally, the grandparents were experiencing fairly significant health problems. Based on these facts, the circuit court ordered the removal of the children from the grandparents' home and placed them in foster care.

Approximately two months later, the grandparents requested the return of the children. The court conducted an evidentiary hearing, in part, to consider this request. It also considered testimony related to the death of a child in the home that had occurred well before the abuse and neglect proceeding had been initiated. At the hearing, the medical examiner testified that the deceased child's injuries were inconsistent with the mother's explanations but concluded that the cause of death was undetermined. Additionally, a DHHR worker testified that the grandparents had repeatedly cancelled appointments for the completion of a home study. Ultimately the home study was not approved. The DHHR worker also heard the grandfather threaten the children with a belt. The criminal background check revealed both a battery conviction and a fairly recent domestic violence conviction. Further, the children soiled their underwear regularly, and one child disclosed that his grandfather had beaten him with a broomstick. Despite this testimony, the circuit court found that the grandparents were the children's psychological parents and that they should receive an improvement period. The order further provided that the children would be returned to the grandparents' home after four weekend visitations, provided that there were no violations of the terms of the improvement period.

On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the circuit court erred because it had not considered the best interests of the children when it entered an order that would allow the children to be returned to the grandparents' custody. The Court expressly noted that: "Simply because a person is found to be a child's psychological parent, however, does not translate into the psychological parent getting custody of the child." 711 S.E.2d at 291. The Court concluded that: "Custody determinations regarding a child or children are still controlled by what is in the best interests of the child." Id. Based upon the facts in the record, the Supreme Court found that the circuit court had overlooked the children's best interests in reaching its decision. The Supreme Court, however, indicated that the circuit court, on remand, could consider whether visitation between the children and their grandparents should continue.

This case involved a dispute about a permanency plan between the child's paternal aunt and the foster parents with whom the child had lived for 22 months. After a permanency hearing in which the foster parents were not allowed to participate, the circuit court ordered the immediate placement of the child with her paternal aunt. The DHHR relied on its adoption policy that required the placement of a child with a relative with an approved home study over a non-relative home.

The Supreme Court observed that, in West Virginia law, the only statutory preferences for placement are grandparents and the reunification of siblings, subject to a child's best interests. With regard to federal law, the Court determined that federal law does not require placement with a blood relative. Rather, federal law only requires that such placements be considered. With regard to relative placements, the Court noted that the DHHR should pursue them early in a case. The Court remanded the case and directed the circuit court to conduct another permanency hearing and to allow the foster parents to participate.

I. Custody Changes

Syl. Pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); Syl. Pt. 8, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); Syl. Pt. 3, Robert Darrell O. v. Theresa Ann O., 192 W. Va. 461, 452 S.E.2d 919 (1994)

It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

Syl. Pt. 7: When a circuit court determines that a gradual change in permanent custodians is necessary, the circuit court may not delegate to a private institution its duty to develop and monitor any plan for the gradual transition of custody of the child(ren).

In re N.A., 227 W. Va. 458, 711 S.E.2d 280 (2011)

Although the Court noted that gradual transition periods should generally be used to implement a change in custody, it observed that the grandparents' repeated violations of prior orders and the grandfather's use of fear and intimidation may well indicate that a gradual transition period would not be suitable.

Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 227 W. Va. 184, 706 S.E.2d 381 (2011)

When the custody of a child was abruptly changed after she had resided with her foster parents for 22 months, the Court stated that: "A child should not be treated like a sack full of potatoes picked up from a local grocery store. The law requires that there must be a gradual transition in cases such as the one before us." 706 S.E.2d at 392.

J. Subsidized Adoption and Legal Guardianship

State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy, 189 W. Va. 210, 429 S.E.2d 492 (1993)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-112

In this case involving a custody dispute between foster parents and the child's half-sister, the Court recognized that "The Legislature has expressly encouraged foster parents who develop emotional ties to the children for whom they care to adopt these children. W. Va. Code § 49-2-17." 429 S.E.2d at 495. The Court further recognized that adoption subsidies established by West Virginia Code § 49-2-17 encourage foster parents to adopt their foster children. Although the Court expressly referred to adoption by foster parents, this statute, as amended, governs subsidies for both adoption and legal guardianships. It also establishes the conditions for a subsidy that include, but are not limited to, a significant bond between a child and his or her foster parents.

In re Adoption of Jamison Nicholas C., 219 W. Va. 729, 639 S.E.2d 821 (2006)

After his mother died, Jamison was placed in the emergency custody of the DHHR. Subsequently, he was placed in the custody of his maternal grandparents who later adopted him. While the adoption was pending, Jamison was diagnosed with ADHD and a depressive disorder. After the adoption was final, Jamison was diagnosed with Asperger's Syndrome. For over five years, he received medical assistance from the DHHR based upon the income of his adoptive parents. Once their income increased, Jamison was no longer eligible for this assistance. The adoptive parents moved the circuit court to amend the adoption order so that Jamison would receive a medical card. The circuit court granted the motion and ordered the DHHR to enter into an adoption assistance agreement with the adoptive parents.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-112

On appeal, the West Virginia Supreme Court found that the DHHR had a duty to notify the adoptive parents of available assistance, that DHHR knew or should have known that the child was a special needs child as described by West Virginia Code § 49-2-17, and that the DHHR knew of both the child and his adoptive parents. Holding that the child was eligible for a medical card, the Court adopted the following new syllabus point:

Syl. Pt. 2: Under the Federal Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980, 42 U.S.C. §§ 670-679b, and W. Va. Code § 49-2-17, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources has an affirmative duty to notify prospective adoptive parents and prospective legal guardians of the availability of assistance for the care of a potentially special needs child in instances where the Department has responsibility for placement and care of the child or is otherwise aware of the child.

XIX. CHILDREN'S RIGHT TO CONTINUED ASSOCIATION

A. Post-Termination Visitation with Parents

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); Syl. Pt. 7, In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997); Syl. Pt. 3, In re William John R., 200 W. Va. 627, 490 S.E.2d 714, (1997); Syl. Pt. 10, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); Syl. Pt. 8, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996); Syl. Pt. 8, In re Emily B., 208 W. Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000); Syl. Pt. 11, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002); Syl. Pt. 8, In re Charity H., 215 W. Va. 208, 599 S.E.2d 631 (2004); Syllabus, In re Alyssa W., 217 W. Va. 707, 619 S.E.2d 220 (2005); Syl. Pt. 8, In re Isaiah A., 228 W. Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010)

When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well-being and would be in the child's best interest.

In this case, the circuit court awarded post-termination visitation to a father with his daughter named Sierra H. who was fourteen months old at the time of removal. His parental rights were terminated because he had sexually abused his daughter's half-sister. Both girls continued to live with their mother.

Addressing whether a close emotional bond justified an award of post-termination visitation, the Court noted that "a close emotional bond generally takes several years to develop. Thus, the possibility of post-termination visitation is usually considered in cases involving children significantly older than Sierra H." 619 S.E.2d at 224. The Court further reasoned that continued visitation would be disruptive to both children's permanent placement. For these reasons, the Supreme Court reversed the award of post-termination visitation.

The circuit court terminated the father's parental rights to his daughter and stepson and denied his request for post-termination visitation. Affirming the circuit court, the Supreme Court noted that the father had failed to visit either child in the two months prior to his parental rights being terminated, both children were very young, and both children had spent more time in the care of others than they had in the father's care. The Court concluded that the father did not have a bond with either child. Further, the Court concluded that the father's failure to meaningfully participate in any of the services offered by DHHR and his failure to comply with any of the circuit court's directives demonstrated that post-termination visitation would not be in the children's best interests.

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Marley M., 231 W. Va. 534, 745 S.E.2d 572 (2013)

A parent whose rights have been terminated pursuant to an abuse and neglect petition may request post-termination visitation. Such request should be brought by written motion, properly noticed for hearing, whereupon the court should hear evidence and arguments of counsel in order to consider the factors established in Syllabus Point 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), except in the event that the court concludes the nature of the underlying circumstances renders further evidence on the issue manifestly unnecessary.

B. Continued Association with Siblings

Syl. Pt. 4, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); Syl. Pt. 9, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996), Syl. Pt. 9, In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); Syl. Pt. 3, Alonzo v. Jacqueline F., 191 W. Va. 248, 445 S.E.2d 189 (1994); Syl. Pt. 9, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Shanee Carol B., 209 W. Va. 658, 550 S.E.2d 636 (2001); Syl. Pt. 4, In re N.A., 227 W. Va. 458, 711 S.E.2d 280 (2011)

In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

C. Continued Association with Foster Parents

Syl. Pt. 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); Syl. Pt. 1, In the Matter of Zachary William R., 203 W. Va. 616, 509 S.E.2d 897 (1998); Syl. Pt. 5, State ex rel. Kutil v. Blake, 223 W. Va. 711, 679 S.E.2d 310 (2009)

A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interest of the child.

D. Continued Association with Grandparents

In re Hunter H., 231 W. Va. 118, 744 S.E.2d 228 (2013)

Syl. Pt. 1: The Grandparent Visitation Act, W.Va. Code § 48-10-101 et seq., is the exclusive means through which a grandparent may seek visitation with a grandchild.

Syl. Pt. 2: The best interests of the child are expressly incorporated into the Grandparent Visitation Act in W.Va. Code §§ 48-10-101, 48-10-501, and 48-10-502.

In re Samantha S., 222 W. Va. 517, 667 S.E.2d 573 (2008)

2. Preference of the Parents

In re Grandparent Visitation of Cathy L.M. v. Mark Brent R., 217 W. Va. 319, 617 S.E.2d 866 (2005)

In this per curiam opinion, the West Virginia Supreme Court reversed an order that granted visitation to a child's grandparents because the lower court failed to give significant weight to the adoptive parents' preference concerning visitation, one of the statutory factors that must be considered by a court. See W. Va. Code § 48-10-502. Relying on Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), the West Virginia Supreme Court concluded that "Troxel instructs that a judicial determination regarding whether grandparent visitation rights are appropriate may not be premised solely on the best interests of the child analysis. It must also consider and give significant weight to the parents' preference, thus precluding a court from intervening in a fit parent's decision making on a best interests basis." 617 S.E.2d at 874-75.

In an abuse and neglect case, the biological parents' rights were terminated and the children were ultimately placed in the physical custody of the paternal grandparents who initiated adoption proceedings. During the course of the abuse and neglect case, the maternal grandparents sought and were granted overnight, unsupervised visitation with the children over the objection of the DHHR, the guardian ad litem and the paternal grandparents. These parties opposed visitation because the children's psychologist indicated that it was a stressor that increased the children's problem behaviors. Additionally, the maternal grandparents allowed the children to talk with their mother while she was incarcerated.

Third, a grandson of the maternal grandparents exposed himself to one of the children, and the maternal grandparents would not sign a safety plan designed to protect the children. When their visitation was later terminated, the maternal grandparents did not appeal the circuit court ruling. Although the maternal grandparents' visitation was terminated after the paternal grandparents appealed the award of visitation, the Court found that the case had not been rendered moot.

Reversing the award of visitation, the Court concluded that the record established that visitation with the maternal grandparents was not in the children's best interests. Further, the Court found that the circuit court had failed to analyze any of the thirteen statutory factors in West Virginia Code § 48-10-502 that are prerequisites for grandparent visitation. The Court specifically noted that the circuit court had failed to adequately consider the effect of the visitation on the children's relationship with their adoptive parents, and any abuse performed, procured, assisted or condoned by the maternal grandparents. The Court further noted that the preference of the pre-adoptive parents (the paternal grandparents) was not given adequate weight.

This case involved a grandparent visitation dispute between a mother and a maternal grandmother. The facts indicated that the grandmother had been a significant caretaker for the first year of the child's life, but the mother terminated all visitation when the child was 11 months old. The family court awarded visitation, and the circuit court affirmed. On appeal, however, the Supreme Court noted that under Troxel, a fit parent's wishes must be given "special weight." The Court further noted that West Virginia Code § 48-10-702(b) creates a rebuttable presumption against awarding grandparent visitation when the parent through whom the grandparent is related has custody of the child, shares custody of the child or exercises visitation privileges with the child. Under the facts presented, the Court reversed the order that had awarded grandparent visitation.

3. Termination of Parental Rights

Syl. Pt. 2, in relevant part, Elmer Jimmy S. v. Kenneth B., 199 W. Va. 263, 483 S.E.2d 846 (1997)

See W. Va. Code §§ 48-10-101, et seq.

West Virginia Code §§ 48-2B-1, et seq. affords circuit courts jurisdiction to consider grandparent visitation under the limited circumstances provided therein, even though the parental rights of the parent for whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild or grandchildren have been terminated.

In this case, the Court referred to, but did not rely on, Rule 15 of RPCANP and its footnote. In its applicable part, Rule 15 states that "the effect of entry of an order of termination of parental rights shall be, inter alia, to prohibit all contact and visitation between the child who is the subject of the petition and the parent who is the subject of the order and the respective grandparents, unless the court finds that the child consents and it is in the best interest of the child to retain a right of visitation." It should be noted, however, that adoption by a non-relative will automatically vacate a previously entered grandparent visitation order. See Syl. Pt. 3, In re Hunter H., 744 S.E. 2d 228 (W. Va. 2013).

Amended in 2015, the footnote to Rule 15 indicates that it is not intended to alter the rights of grandparents set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq. and West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-101, et seq.

4. The Effect of Adoption on Grandparent Visitation

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Hunter H., 231 W. Va. 118, 744 S.E. 2d 228 (2013)

Pursuant to W.Va.Code § 48-10-902, the Grandparent Visitation Act automatically vacates a grandparent visitation order after a child is adopted by a non-relative. The Grandparent Visitation Act contains no provision allowing a grandparent to file a post-adoption visitation petition when the child is adopted by a non-relative.

This certified question case addressed whether a grandparent could continue to receive visitation after a child was adopted by non-relatives. In this case, the parental rights of a 18-month old child were terminated. Initially, the child was placed with his maternal grandmother but was removed because of concerns about the grandmother's then-husband. After the child had resided with his foster parents for three years, the circuit court ordered immediate placement with the grandmother. This decision was reversed by the Supreme Court in In re Hunter H., 715 S.E.2d 397 (W. Va. 2011), and the child was returned to the foster parents. During the six-month waiting period for the adoption, the circuit court entered an order that granted the grandmother visitation every other weekend. Subsequent to the adoption by non-relatives, the question arose as to whether the visitation should continue in light of the child's right to continued association with his biological grandmother.

As a starting basis for its analysis, the Court recognized that the Grandparent Visitation Statute, West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-101, et seq. is the exclusive means for seeking grandparent visitation. Based upon the express language of the statute, the Court recognized that the best interests of the child considerations are incorporated in Sections 101, 501 and 502 of the statute. Additionally, the Court observed that Section 902 "states that a grandparent's visitation rights are automatically vacated when a child is adopted by a non-relative." The Court further noted that the Grandparent Visitation Statute does not allow a grandparent to request visitation once a child has been adopted by a non-relative. Continuing its further explanation for its decision, the Court discussed West Virginia cases, as well as caselaw from other statutes that govern grandparent visitation.

Answering the certified question, the Court adopted Syllabus Point 3 and held that an order of adoption by a non-relative automatically vacates a grandparent visitation order. It also held that the Grandparent Visitation Statute does not provide or allow a biological grandparent to seek visitation after a child has been adopted by a non-relative.

In this case, a stepfather adopted his stepson, and subsequently, the paternal grandparents petitioned for visitation. The Court held that a grandparent is not limited to seeking visitation prior to an adoption if the adoption is either a step-parent or other family member. In so ruling, the Court noted that the legislature had distinguished between adoptions that occur within the family and those that occur outside of the family. When adoption occurs outside a family, any prior order of grandparent visitation is vacated in accordance with the applicable statutory subsection.

Additionally, the Court held that "the West Virginia Grandparent Visitation Act, West Virginia Code § 48-2B-1 to -12 by its terms, does not violate the substantive due process right of liberty extended to a parent in connection with his/her right to exercise care, custody, and control over his/her child[ren] without undue interference from the state." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, Brandon L., supra. (Currently, West Virginia §§ 48-10-101, et seq. controls grandparent visitation.)

Pt. 1, State ex rel. DHHR v. Fox, 218 W. Va. 397, 624 S.E.2d 834 (2005)

upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

1. Two-Prong Deferential Standard

Syl. Pt. 1, McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996); Syl. Pt. 1, In re William John R., 200 W. Va. 627, 490 S.E.2d 714 (1997); Syllabus, In re Brandon Lee B., 211 W. Va. 587, 567 S.E.2d 597 (2001)

When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999); Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)

Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Com'n, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Shanee Carol B., 209 W. Va. 658, 550 S.E.2d 636 (2001)

In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

2. Questions of Law -- De Novo Review

Syl. Pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002)

Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.

3. Denial of Continuance -- Reviewed on Ad Hoc Basis

In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)

Again, we acknowledge that the determination as to whether a denial of a continuance constitutes an abuse of discretion must be made on an ad hoc basis. When confronted with a motion for a continuance, the trial court may have a variety of concerns. Obviously, the reasons that the movant contemporaneously adduces in support of the request are important. Then, too, the court is likely to take into account prior postponements. Thus, the test for deciding whether the circuit court abused its discretion is not mechanical; it depends on the reasons presented to the circuit court at the time the request was made. In other words, this issue must be decided in light of the circumstances presented, focusing upon the reasons for the continuance offered to the circuit court when the request was denied. As we discuss above, there are important interests implicated other than those of the parents. In addition to the sacred rights of the affected children, there is a societal interest in providing for speedy disposition of abuse and neglect cases which exists separate from, and at times in opposition to, the parents' interest. The inability of courts to bring these matters to a prompt disposition contributes immeasurably to large backlogs of abuse and neglect cases and often prevents the courts form doing what is in the best interest of the children. The older a child becomes while waiting in the judicial system, the more difficult quality permanent placement becomes. In this context, abuse can be found in the denial of a continuance only when it can be seen as "an unreasonable and arbitrary insistence upon expeditiousness in the face of a justifiable request for delay[.]" Morris v. Slappy, 461 U.S. 1, 11-12, 103 S. Ct. 1610, 1616, 75 L.Ed.2d 610, 620 (1983), quoting Ungar v. Sarafite, 376 U.S. 575, 589, 84 S. Ct. 841, 849, 11 L.Ed.2d 921, 931 (1964). It is in the province of the circuit court to manage its docket, and within that province, to decide what constitutes a reasonable time to be prepared to defend these type allegations. 470 S.E.2d at 189-90.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k)

State ex rel. S.C. v. Chafin, 191 W. Va. 184, 444 S.E.2d 62 (1994)

The petitioner, S.C., a juvenile, sought a writ of habeas corpus and a writ of mandamus against the DHHR and the Director of Laurel Park Presley Ridge School to compel her release from the school and to require the DHHR to comply with W. Va. Code § 49-6-3, which allows the DHHR to maintain temporary custody of a child for no more than sixty days; W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a), which requires the DHHR to file with the court the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child; W. Va. Code § 49-6-8(a), which requires the DHHR to file with the court a petition for review of order of disposition in accordance with the best interest of the child. The statute requires that the court retain continuing jurisdiction over cases reviewed under this section for as long as a child remains in temporary foster care.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-602

W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(a)

The Court held that the purpose of the child's case plan is the same as the family case plan, except that the focus of the child's case plan is on the child rather than the family unit. The child's case plan is to include, where applicable, the requirements of a family case plan as established by the relevant provisions of Chapter 49.

Finally, the Court held that W. Va. Code § 49-6-8(d) requires the DHHR to file a report with the circuit court in any case where any child in the temporary or permanent custody of the DHHR receives more than three placements in one year no later than thirty days after the third placement.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-608(g)

Jennifer A. v. Burgess, No. 21009 (W. Va. Supreme Court unpublished order entered May 15, 1992)

Writ of mandamus was granted directing DHHR to create and submit within ninety days guidelines for dealing with alleged sexual abuse cases involving children. Guidelines must be concise, compact and detail specific steps for child protective services worker to follow upon receipt of complaint. Recommend routine determination on need for counseling as well as a prepared checklist of completed steps. Upon completion of the guidelines, training programs are to begin. Prior to dismissal or closure of any case, recommendation is made that the case be reviewed by a child protective services supervisor or other individual in authority as a final safeguard against closure of a meritorious case.

State ex rel. Aaron M. v. DHHR, 212 W. Va. 323, 571 S.E.2d 142 (2001)

The guardian ad litem sought a writ of mandamus to compel the DHHR to pay a therapist for an outstanding bill for the therapy of an abused and neglected child. The Court granted the writ, but required the DHHR to pay the therapist at the Medicaid rate, not at the higher rate that was billed initially. Subsequent to this decision the Legislature codified the holding of the case. In 2015, the provision was codified at West Virginia Code § 49-4-108.

Although the applicable statute allows the DHHR to pay for health services and expert witnesses in juvenile and abuse and neglect cases at the Medicaid rate, if available, the Court has not held that the DHHR has the "exclusive authority" to set expert witness fees. Rather, the Court has found that "a circuit court still remains the ultimate authority for entry of all orders directing payment of expert witness fees in abuse and neglect cases." 575 S.E.2d at 313. The applicable provision is codified at West Virginia Code § 49-4-108.

In re Bobby Lee B., 218 W. Va. 689, 629 S.E.2d 748 (2006)

In this case, the Supreme Court reversed the circuit court because it did not apply the payment restrictions set forth in the relevant statute for professional services in a juvenile delinquency case. Referring to Hewitt v. DHHR, supra, the Court noted that the payment restrictions in West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 apply to both abuse and neglect cases and juvenile cases.

W. Va. Code § 49-4-108

Note: For a complete discussion of this case, see Section II. J. For a discussion of the authority of the circuit court to set expert witness fees, see Special Procedures Section IV. B.

In this case involving a dispute over the payment of expert witness fees, the Court concluded that the relevant statutory provisions allowed the circuit court the discretion to require the DHHR to pay fees for an expert witness in an abuse and neglect or juvenile case. The Court noted that the statute states that the court "may" require the DHHR to pay for "professional services" that include "'evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony' by an expert witness." 700 S.E.2d at 824. Based upon this reasoning, the Court affirmed the order that required the DHHR to pay the fees for the expert witness.

The Court, however, reversed the circuit court insofar as its order required the DHHR to pay the expert witness fee according to the schedule established by the Public Defender Corporation. The Court concluded that the statute established that the DHHR has the sole authority to set the fee schedule for professional services provided in abuse and neglect and juvenile cases. The Court remanded the case to the circuit court, to allow the DHHR to establish the fee schedule for the payment of the expert. In two new syllabus points, the Court held that:

W. Va. Code § 49-4-108

Syl. Pt. 5: Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33, a circuit court "may ... order the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services" incurred in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. Such "professional services" include, but are not limited to, "evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony" by an expert witness. W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

Syl. Pt. 6: When a circuit court orders the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services, including those provided by an expert witness, pursuant to the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33, the Department of Health and Human Resources shall be permitted to establish the fee schedule by which the professional will be paid "in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate [with] adjust[ments to] the schedule as appropriate." W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

In re Joseph G., 214 W. Va. 365, 589 S.E.2d 507 (2003) (per curiam)

Note: This case involves an appeal, rather than a writ of mandamus. It is included in this section, however, because the issues addressed in it are most similar to the issues raised in mandamus cases against the DHHR.

This case involved a contractual dispute between the DHHR and a residential facility. The dispute concerned the payment for a child's placement once the services were determined to be no longer medically necessary and were, therefore, ineligible for Medicaid reimbursement. The child remained at the facility pursuant to a valid court order after the MDT recommended his continued placement at the facility.

The trial court ruled that the DHHR was liable for the outstanding payments because the facility was not contractually obligated to continue providing care for the child once the Medicaid eligibility for the services terminated. Affirming the trial court, the Supreme Court noted that the contract was silent concerning this situation, that a prior contract required the DHHR to pay for care in this situation, and that the facility was contractually prohibited from discharging the child without a planned alternate placement.

D. Prohibition Available

Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996)

W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(d)

Prohibition is available to abused and/or neglected children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of a greater extent and duration than permitted under W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-2(b) and 49-6-5(c).

W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(3)

The State and the children's guardian ad litem sought relief from an order in which the Respondent judge ordered a post-adjudicatory improvement period for the Respondent mother. The Petitioners contended that an additional improvement period was not in the best interests of the child. We granted the Petitioners' request and prohibited the circuit court from enforcing its order granting a post-adjudicatory improvement period. We also ordered the circuit court to set this matter immediately for final disposition pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5. In granting the requested relief, we held that prohibition is available to abused and/or neglected children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of a greater extent and duration than permitted under W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-2(b) and 49-6-5(c). Further, there is clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse and neglect proceedings. W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

Kaufman,* 199 W. Va. 269, 483 S.E.2d 852 (1997); Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996)

In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance.

E. Appellate Actions Necessary to Protect Children

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Timber M., 231 W. Va. 44, 743 S.E.2d 352 (2013)

In cases involving the abuse and neglect of children, when it appears from this Court's review of the record on appeal that the health and welfare of a child may be at risk as a result of the child's custodial placement, regardless of whether that placement is an issue raised in the appeal, this Court will take such action as it deems appropriate and necessary to protect that child.

In response to a disclosure by her eight-year old daughter, a mother taught her daughter how to make a recording with a cell phone in the hopes of recording another incident of sexual abuse by the stepfather. After the mother learned of the sexual abuse, she continued to live with the stepfather, and at times, left her children alone with him. The circuit court terminated the mother's parental rights for her refusal to admit any wrongdoing in her response to the stepfather's sexual abuse. As a permanency plan, the circuit court placed the children with their father.

On appeal, the Court was extremely troubled because there were substantiated allegations of the father sexually abusing a stepdaughter, and criminal charges had been filed against him as a result of the allegations. Apparently, the State dismissed the criminal case without specifying any substantive reason. Reviewing the record, the Court noted that there was no indication that the victim had retracted the allegations. In addition, the father minimized the mother's culpability with regard to her response to the sexual abuse by the stepfather. Further, the record failed to explain why the Department felt that the children's placement with their father was a good idea in light of the substantiated sexual abuse allegations. Finally, the record failed to indicate whether anyone had investigated the reason for the dismissal of the sexual abuse charges against the father. For those reasons, the Court held that it could take "appropriate and necessary" action to protect a child even if issues concerning the children's placement had not been raised on appeal. Accordingly, the Court remanded the case for a determination as to whether the placement of the children with their father was appropriate.

XXI. CONTEMPT ACTIONS IN ABUSE AND NEGLECT CASES

Syl. Pt. 1, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Brandon Lee H.S., 218 W. Va. 724, 629 S.E.2d 783 (2006) (per curiam)

In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review.

B. Contempt Proceedings in Abuse and Neglect Cases

The guardian ad litem and counsel for the respondent father filed a contempt petition when a CPS worker was not assigned to a case. As a result, the DHHR failed to conduct visitations and provide drug-related services as ordered. At a hearing on the contempt petition, the circuit court found that the failure to assign a CPS worker was the result of severe staffing shortages in this eastern panhandle office, not the result of willful disobedience of local DHHR employees. The circuit court ordered the DHHR to take immediate steps to alleviate the staff shortage, including the use of geographic pay differentials for CPS workers.

On appeal, the DHHR argued that the circuit court erred when it addressed staff-related issues that were unrelated to the specific abuse and neglect case. The West Virginia Supreme Court, however, held that: "the trial court had the authority, subject to the limitations required in this opinion, to compel the Department to act to remedy the serious effects of the significant staff shortage at issue, specifically, in this case, and generally, in other abuse and neglect proceedings before that court." 629 S.E.2d at 788. The Court further held that the circuit court did not err when it directed the DHHR to hire additional personnel. The Court, however, reversed the provisions in the circuit court order requiring the DHHR to implement geographical pay differentials because those provisions violated the Separation of Powers doctrine set forth in the West Virginia Constitution.

In this contempt proceeding, the circuit court found a sheriff in contempt when he did not assist in the removal of minor children from a home and did not serve the abuse and neglect petition and removal order at the time directed by a juvenile referee. Reversing the circuit court, the Supreme Court held that the sheriff's actions did not constitute contempt because the underlying order did not require the sheriff to serve the order and to assist in the removal. Further, the Court observed that the sheriff could have concluded that the problem was resolved because a state trooper had volunteered to serve the order. Finally, the Court found that a finding of contempt was unwarranted because the sheriff had not violated any of his statutory duties.

XXII. CRIMINAL PROSECUTION

A. Prosecutors' Role

State v. James R., II, 188 W. Va. 44, 422 S.E.2d 521 (1992)

In this case, the Court overturned a ruling which prohibited a prosecutor from representing the State in criminal proceedings in which the prosecutor had formerly represented the State in abuse and neglect proceedings against the same person. The Court held that such prior representation was insufficient to support disqualification of the prosecutor in the criminal proceedings, particularly in light of its further holding that no evidence acquired from a parent or custodian as the result of examinations performed in the course of abuse and neglect proceedings may be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings.

Syl. Pt. 5, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997)

When county prosecutors represent the DHHR, they may not invoke the Supreme Court of Appeals' appellate or original jurisdiction in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding, unless they have the express consent and approval of DHHR.

B. Medical and Mental Examinations of Victims

State v. Delaney, 187 W. Va. 212, 417 S.E.2d 903 (1992)

Affirming a six-count conviction of sexual assault, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that the trial court erred in refusing to permit the alleged child victims to be physically and psychologically examined by his experts, holding that a defendant must present evidence of a "compelling need or reason" for such examinations. The court set forth a six-part test for determining when independent examinations may be warranted: (1) the nature of the examination requested; (2) the age of the victim; (3) the potential trauma to the victim; (4) the probative value of the results of the requested examination; (5) the period of time since the alleged criminal act; and (6) the evidence already available to the defendant.

C. Expert Psychological Testimony

Syl. Pt. 7, State v. Edward Charles L., Sr., 183 W. Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990); Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Wood, 194 W. Va. 525, 460 S.E.2d 771 (1995)

Expert psychological testimony is permissible in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse and an expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused. Such an expert may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant, as these would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury.

D. Testimonial Evidence

Note: The cases discussed below do not involve child abuse and neglect. However, the instruction about the admissibility of testimonial hearsay is applicable to criminal prosecutions involving child abuse and neglect.

Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004)

In this case, the defendant was convicted of first-degree assault with a deadly weapon. At trial, the defendant's wife, a witness to the assault, did not testify because the defendant asserted a state-law marital privilege which prevents a spouse from testifying without the consent of the other spouse. The trial court, however, admitted the wife's statement to police officers because it found that the statement bore "'particularized guarantees of trustworthiness.'" Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. at 1358, 124 S. Ct. at 1358 (quoting Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S. Ct. 2531 (1980)). The mid-tier appellate court reversed the trial court, but the Washington Supreme Court held that the statement bore guarantees of trustworthiness and upheld the conviction. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine whether the admission of the statement violated the defendant's right to confront witnesses as provided by the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

In Crawford, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the defendant's right to confrontation was violated by the admission of the wife's statement to police officers. To reach its holding, the U.S. Supreme Court established a new test – whether hearsay statements are testimonial or nontestimonial. To admit the testimonial statement of a witness, the Court held that the witness must be unavailable and the defendant must have had a prior opportunity for cross-examination. However, nontestimonial statements may be admissible under state-law exceptions to a hearsay rule. Further, the Court expressly overruled Ohio v. Roberts which allowed for the admission of hearsay statements if the declarant was unavailable and the statement bore "adequate 'indicia of reliability.'" Roberts, 448 U.S. at 66, 100 S. Ct. at 2538. The holding in Crawford, therefore, requires the exclusion of testimonial statements in criminal prosecutions unless the witness is unavailable and the defendant had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness.

Although the Court established the categories of testimonial and nontestimonial statements, it declined to establish precise definitions for them. However, it provided some guidance on the parameters of these two categories. Distinguishing between testimonial and nontestimonial statements, the Court noted that: "An accuser who makes a formal statement to government officers bears testimony in a sense that a person who makes a casual remark to an acquaintance does not." Crawford, 541 U.S. at 51, 124 S. Ct. at 1364. The Court further indicated that testimonial statements include affidavits, deposition testimony, prior testimony or confessions. With particular application to the wife's statement, the Court concluded that a prototypical example of a testimonial statement is a statement made to a police officer.

Addressing two state court cases, the United States Supreme Court established a test to determine whether statements made during a 911 call or made to law enforcement at a crime scene are testimonial, and are therefore, subject to the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution. In the first case, a domestic violence victim made statements to a 911 operator that were admitted into evidence at trial. As is common in domestic violence prosecutions, the victim did not testify at trial.

In the second case, the police conducted an investigation of a domestic disturbance. When the police arrived at the scene, they interviewed the victim and the perpetrator in different rooms. As part of the investigation, the victim signed an affidavit and told the officers what had happened. As in the first case, the victim did not testify at trial. At trial, the victim's affidavit was admitted under the present sense impression to the hearsay rule, and her statements were admitted under the excited utterance exception.

As the Court began its analysis, it noted that it had previously determined that testimonial statements included "'[s]tatements taken by police officers in the course of interrogations.'" 126 S. Ct. at 2273 (quoting Crawford, supra.). The Court recognized, however, that it had not established a precise definition for the term "testimonial."

Establishing parameters to determine whether a statement is testimonial, the United States Supreme Court adopted the following test:

> Statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution. 126 S. Ct. at 2273-74 (emphasis added).

Applying the test to the 911 call, the Court found that the purpose of the call was not to establish the facts of a past crime or occurrence that could be used to convict the defendant. Rather, the Court concluded that the purpose of the call was to request help for a present, ongoing emergency. Additionally, the information elicited by the 911 operator was for the purpose of responding to the emergency, not to learn what had previously happened. For this reason the Court held that the statements to the 911 operator were nontestimonial and were admissible under exceptions to the hearsay rule.

The Court, however, cautioned that a statement taken in response to an emergency may evolve into a statement that would properly be considered testimonial. The Court noted that the victim's responses to the operator's questions in the latter part of the 911 call could be considered testimonial. To resolve issues of this nature, the Court determined that trial courts, through an in limine review procedure, should determine whether statements, or portions of them, should be excluded pursuant to Crawford and Davis.

In the second case involving the police interview of a domestic violence victim, the Court held that the victim's statements were testimonial because there was no ongoing emergency. The Court found that the primary purpose of the interrogation by the officers was to determine what had already happened and whether a crime had been committed.

The Court further addressed the practical problem faced in domestic violence prosecutions, that is – that domestic violence victims often do not testify at trial. As a solution to this common problem, the Court noted that the rule of forfeiture by wrongdoing defeats confrontation claims. The Court expressly stated that: "[O]ne who obtains the absence of a witness by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation." 126 S. Ct. at 2280. Although it discussed forfeiture, the Court expressly stated that it was not adopting a standard necessary to prove forfeiture. It did, however,

State v. Ferguson, 216 W. Va. 420, 607 S.E.2d 526 (2004)

In this murder case, the trial court allowed the admission of hearsay statements about a prior incident between the victim and the defendant. At trial, friends of the victim testified about statements the victim had made about an incident in which the defendant threatened the victim with a knife. On appeal, the defendant argued that Crawford barred the admission of the statements. Affirming the trial court, the Supreme Court held that: "[W]e do not perceive that Crawford's largely unexplored ban on 'testimonial hearsay' that has not been tested by cross-examination extends to the statements to non-official and non-investigatorial witnesses, made prior to and apart from any governmental investigation that are issues in this case." 607 S.E.2d at 529.

State v. Mechling, 219 W. Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006)

In this misdemeanor domestic violence prosecution, the victim did not appear and testify at trial. The trial court, however, admitted the victim's statements to a neighbor and also to police officers.

On appeal, the West Virginia Supreme Court first discussed its prior adoption of the rule set forth in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S. Ct. 2531, 65 L.E.2d 597 (1980) in the following three West Virginia cases: State v. James Edward S.; State v. Mason; and State v. Kennedy. The Court recognized that Crawford overruled the test set forth in Roberts that allowed admission of hearsay statements that had an "adequate 'indicia of reliability.'" In Syllabus Point 7 of this opinion, the Court overruled the three West Virginia cases that adopted the test set forth in Roberts to the extent that they allowed for the admission of testimonial statements by witnesses.

After overruling the cases noted above, the West Virginia Supreme Court discussed the holdings in both Crawford and Davis. In the new syllabus points set forth below, the West Virginia Supreme Court adopted the holdings of Crawford and Davis to determine whether a statement is testimonial. Following the guidance of the United States Supreme Court, the West Virginia Supreme Court recognized that a defendant may forfeit his or her right to confrontation if he or she, by wrongdoing, obtains the absence of a witness.

With regard to the facts of the instant case, the West Virginia Supreme Court held that the victim's statements to the police officers were testimonial and, therefore, should have been excluded. The Court, however, remanded the case to the trial court to determine whether the victim's statements to her neighbor could be considered testimonial or not.

Syl. Pt. 6: Pursuant to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution bars the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness. See Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Jessica Jane M., 226 W. Va. 242, 700 S.E.2d 302 (2010); Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Lambert, 232 W. Va. 104, 750 S.E.2d 657 (2013).

Syl. Pt. 7: To the extent that State v. James Edward S., 184 W. Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), State v. Mason, 194 W. Va. 221, 460 S.E.2d 36 (1995), and State v. Kennedy, 205 W. Va. 224, 517 S.E.2d 457 (1999), rely upon Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S. Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980) (overruled by Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004)) and permit the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, regardless of the witness's unavailability for trial and regardless of whether the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness, those cases are overruled.

Syl. Pt. 8: Under the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, a testimonial statement is, generally a statement that is made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial.

Syl. Pt. 9: Under the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, a witness's statement taken by a law enforcement officer in the course of an interrogation is testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the witness's statement is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution. A witness's statement taken by a law enforcement officer in the course of an interrogation is non-testimonial when made under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the statement is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency.

Syl. Pt. 10: A court assessing whether a witness's out-of-court statement is "testimonial" should focus more upon the witness's statement, and less upon any interrogator's questions.

Syl. Pt. 11: Under the doctrine of forfeiture, an accused who obtains the absence of a witness by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation.

In this abuse and neglect case, the Department contended that a child was abused because his father had allegedly killed the child's brother. Subject to criminal charges as well as the abuse and neglect petition, the father was tried and convicted, but the verdict was set aside because of juror misconduct. Faced with a second trial, the father entered an Alford plea, "a guilty plea by a defendant who continues to protest his or her innocence," to involuntary manslaughter. 624 S.E.2d 834, n. 4. (This type of plea was recognized by the West Virginia Supreme Court in Kennedy v. Frazier, 357 S.E.2d 43 (W. Va. 1987), and may be referred to as a Kennedy plea.)

In the dissenting and two concurring opinions, the significance of the father's entry of an Alford plea was addressed. The dissent indicated that the plea supported a conclusion of child abuse. In the first concurring opinion, it was recognized that the father's entry of an Alford plea allowed him the opportunity to avoid prison and thereby the chance to regain custody of his son. In the second concurring opinion, it was recognized that the entry of the plea was the result of the financial burden associated with the defense of criminal charges. Although the Alford plea was discussed, the majority opinion did not adopt a rule of law concerning the significance of an Alford plea in a criminal case to an abuse and neglect case.

F. Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Acts

State v. Mongold, 220 W. Va. 259, 647 S.E.2d 539 (2007)

In this case, the defendant was convicted of the crime of death of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian by child abuse in violation of W. Va. Code § 61-8D-2a. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the trial court erred when it allowed the prosecution to cross-examine him on a prior child abuse incident pursuant to Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence because he did not receive pretrial notice from the State and he had been acquitted of the prior felony child abuse charge.

The Supreme Court disagreed and adopted the following syllabus points:

Syl. Pt. 3: Rule 404(b)[20] of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence requires the prosecution in a criminal case to disclose evidence of other

[20] Rule 404(b) has been amended. Any party who seeks to admit this type of evidence must disclose it before trial unless the court excuses the lack of pretrial notice. The duty to disclose is no longer trigged by a crimes, wrongs or acts prior to trial if such disclosure has been requested by the accused; however, upon reasonable notice such evidence may be disclosed for the first time during trial upon a showing of good cause for failure to provide the requested pretrial notice.

Syl. Pt. 4: The fact that a criminal charge against a defendant is dismissed or that he/she is acquitted of the same does not prohibit use of the incident under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence.

XXIII. CRIMINAL OFFENSES INVOLVING ABUSE AND NEGLECT OF CHILDREN

A. Felonious Neglect

State v. DeBerry, 185 W. Va. 512, 408 S.E.2d 91 (1991)

The defendant mother took her 12 year old daughter to a party where she knew alcohol would be served. Once there, the defendant encouraged her daughter to consume alcohol. The daughter did so until she lost consciousness. The defendant then arranged for a man to carry her daughter's unconscious body home, while the defendant remained at the party. The man raped the daughter, after which the daughter dies from acute ethanol intoxication. The Court reversed a trial court's dismissal of a charge of causing serious bodily injury to a child by felonious neglect, holding that (1) to obtain a conviction pursuant to W. Va. Code § 61-8D-4(b), the state must prove that the defendant neglected a minor child within the meaning of the term neglect found in W. Va. Code § 61-8D-1(6). The term neglect is defined as "the unreasonable failure by a parent, guardian, or any person voluntarily accepting a supervisory role towards a minor child to exercise a minimum degree of care to assure said minor child's physical safety or health." The state must also prove that the neglect caused serious bodily injury. There is no need, however, for the state to prove criminal intent under the statute; and (2) the term neglect as defined by the statute is not unconstitutionally vague.

B. Sexual Assault

The defendant was convicted of two counts of first degree sexual assault and two counts of first degree sexual abuse of his four year old son and daughter. The defendant assaulted his son both orally and anally. He assaulted his daughter by inserting his finger into her vagina. The state introduced collateral evidence of the defendant's sexual acts and sexual tendencies toward the children. Also introduced into evidence were

---

statements about the crime made by the child victim to his treating psychologist and his mother.

C. Abuse Creating Substantial Risk of Injury or Death

Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Snodgrass, 207 W. Va. 631, 535 S.E.2d 475 (2000)

The offense of child abuse creating a risk of injury as set forth in W. Va. Code § 61-8D-3(c) is committed when any person inflicts upon a minor physical injury by other than accidental means and by such action, creates a substantial possibility of serious bodily injury or death.

D. Death of a Child by a Parent, Guardian or Custodian by Child Abuse

While in his care, the defendant's two year old stepdaughter was rushed to the hospital when she became limp and unresponsive. At the hospital, doctors concluded that the child was suffering from swelling of the brain and that she had blood on the surface of her skull. The child died two days later and an autopsy revealed that the cause of her death was four blunt impacts to the head.

At trial, the defendant claimed that her injuries could have been caused by a fall from the deck, being knocked over by the family dog, or when the defendant and the child were playing a game of airplane. The state's evidence indicated that the injuries could not have occurred as claimed by the defendant. The jury found the defendant guilty of death of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian by child abuse pursuant to W. Va. Code § 61-8D-2a.

XXIV. FAMILY COURT PROCEEDINGS INVOLVING ABUSE AND NEGLECT ALLEGATIONS

Note: For a discussion of caselaw involving the overlap of child abuse and neglect issues in family and circuit court, see Caselaw Digest Section III. For a complete discussion of pre-petition proceedings relating to child abuse and neglect, see Special Procedures Section X.

A. Referral of Child Abuse and Neglect Allegations to the DHHR by Judicial Officials

Syl. Pt. 6, John D.K. v. Polly A.S., 190 W. Va. 254, 438 S.E.2d 46 (1993)

W. Va. Code § 49-2-803

Under W. Va. Code § 49-6A-2, it is mandatory for any circuit judge, family law master, or magistrate having reasonable cause to suspect abuse or neglect to immediately report the same to the Division of Human Services of the Department of Health and Human Resources.

Syl. Pt. 8, Katherine B.T. v. Jackson, 220 W. Va. 219, 640 S.E.2d 569 (2006)

When any circuit court judge, family court judge, or magistrate has reasonable cause to suspect that a child is neglected or abused, the circuit court judge, family court judge, or magistrate shall immediately report the suspected neglect or abuse to the state child protective services agency pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6A-2 and, if applicable, Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court.

W. Va. Code § 49-2-803

B. Emergency Change of Custody

Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. George B.W. v. Kaufman, 199 W. Va. 269, 483 S.E.2d 852 (1997); Syl. Pt. 2, Haller v. Haller, 198 W. Va. 487, 481 S.E.2d 793 (1996)

Although a court may enter an emergency order transferring custody where there are allegations of abuse or neglect without notice and full hearing if the court deems such an order necessary for the immediate protection of the child(ren), such order should be of limited duration, should set a prompt and full hearing on the allegations, and should appraise both parties of the scope of the hearing. In the event such emergency change is found to be warranted, the court should immediately appoint a guardian ad litem for the child.

C. Minor Guardianship Proceedings

Syl. Pt. 12, Brooke B. v. Donald C., 230 W. Va. 355, 738 S.E.2d 21 (2013)

W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) places jurisdiction and venue of an infant guardianship action in the West Virginia county in which a minor resides. It is the minor's residency alone that controls, and not the residency of any other person such as a parent, guardian, or other person with custody or control of the minor. A determination of the minor's residency is typically a question of fact.

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Antonio R.A., 228 W. Va. 380, 719 S.E.2d 850 (2011)

A family or circuit court's authority to appoint a suitable person as a guardian for a minor, including a minor above the age of fourteen, is derived from West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 (2010), which grants courts discretion in determining when the appointment of a guardian for a minor is appropriate. West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 (2010), which entitles a minor above the age of fourteen to nominate his or her own guardian, applies only after a court has determined, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, that a particular circumstance warrants the appointment of a guardian.

Syl. Pt. 6: Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a), the circuit court or family court of the county in which a minor resides may appoint a suitable person to serve as the minor's guardian. In appointing a guardian, the court shall give priority to the minor's mother or father. "However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian." W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a).

Syl. Pt. 7: Rule 48a(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court requires that if a family court presiding over a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 learns that the basis for the petition, in whole or in part, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court is required to remove the petition to circuit court for a hearing thereon. Furthermore, "[a]t the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence." West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court 48a(a).

After a custody dispute arose between a mother and maternal grandparents, the parties each filed domestic violence petitions and minor guardianship petitions. The grandparents also filed an amended guardianship petition that included abuse and neglect allegations. After the family court conducted initial proceedings, it appointed the grandparents as temporary guardians of the minor, removed the case to circuit court and referred the matter to Child Protective Services to investigate the abuse and neglect allegations. After conducting several evidentiary hearings, the circuit court appointed the mother as the guardian of the child and the grandparents appealed.

Reviewing the minor guardianship statute, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, the Court recognized that "a court shall give priority to the minor's mother or father." Syl. Pt. 6, in part, Abbigail Faye B., supra. Notwithstanding this priority, the Court further held that: "'[I]n every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian.' W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a)." Id. Therefore, the preference for appointing a parent as a guardian may give way based upon the competency and fitness of the guardian and the child's best interests.

The Court further discussed the provisions of Rule 48a of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court that address removal of minor guardianship cases to circuit court when a minor guardianship is based, in whole or part, upon abuse and neglect allegations. The Court expressly noted that the directives of this rule were clear and that the family court had correctly removed the case to circuit court.

In re Richard P., 227 W. Va. 285, 708 S.E.2d 479 (2010)

This case originated when the petitioners filed a minor guardianship petition in family court. One of the petitioners, Jennifer P., was a parent of two minor children, and the second petitioner, Cary P., had been residing with them for a significant period of time and had been providing parental care for the children. In the petition, the petitioners sought to have Cary P. named as the children's legal guardian so that she could make medical, educational and other legal decisions for the children when Jennifer P. was unavailable. As background, the petition indicated that the children's father has been abusive to Jennifer P. and the children. Because the petition contained allegations of abuse and neglect, the family court transferred the case to circuit court.

The primary holding of this case did not involve the appointment of a guardian because of abuse and neglect. Rather, it involved the Caregiver's Consent Act, West Virginia Code §§ 49-2-701, et seq., an act that allows parents to designate a third party who resides with the children to consent to health care for the children, provided the requirements of the statute have been fulfilled. The Court did, however, note that either the family or circuit court may rule on a minor guardianship petition and discussed the transfer provisions in Rule 48a(a) of the Family Court Rules if a minor guardianship proceeding is based upon allegations of abuse and neglect.

The primary issue in this case was whether a five-year minor guardianship should continue. The minor guardianship was originally established because the mother was going to prison for fraudulent use of a credit card and some related misdemeanors. After completing both her sentence and parole and making significant positive changes in her life, the mother sought to have the guardianship terminated. Although it was evident that the child had thrived under the care of her guardian, the circuit court terminated the guardianship because "the ability for another person to provide for a child does not render a parent unfit to raise her child." 745 S.E.2d at 538. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the circuit court had correctly applied the law to the facts and affirmed the ruling.

In re I.T., 233 W. Va. 500, 759 S.E.2d 447 (2014) (per curiam)

The grandmother of a child filed a minor guardianship petition in family court based upon the mother's alleged unfitness. An order was entered that granted the grandmother temporary custody, and the case was removed to circuit court because the mother had filed several domestic violence petitions. After conducting two evidentiary hearings in which a CPS worker testified that CPS did not have a reason to object to placing custody of the child with the mother, the circuit court awarded custody to the mother. Affirming the circuit court ruling, the Supreme Court held that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion.

The issue in this case was whether the family court had correctly terminated a grandmother's eight-year guardianship of K.H., a minor child. When K.H. was born, she resided with her mother, and her father did not meet the child until she was over a year old. Approximately six weeks after the meeting between the child and her father, K.H.'s mother died in a car accident. In response to these circumstances, K.H.'s maternal grandmother petitioned for and was appointed guardian for K.H. At this initial hearing, the father did not object to the grandmother's appointment as a guardian.

A year later, the father filed a petition to establish custodial responsibility for K.H., and he received parenting time every other weekend and began paying child support. Two years later, the father filed a petition to revoke the guardianship, and it was resolved by an agreed order that granted the father increased parenting time.

Approximately two years later, the father filed another petition to revoke the guardianship. A guardian ad litem was appointed, and he recommended that the child be placed in her father's custody based upon the father's ability to care for the child. The guardian ad litem also discovered that the grandmother had been sharing custody of the child with a 76-year-old man who had an extensive criminal history. A psychologist, hired by the grandmother, testified that the child viewed the grandmother as her mother. The psychologist did not, however, interview the father. After hearing the evidence, the family court terminated the guardianship and denied the grandmother's request for visitation.

As an initial allegation of error, the grandmother argued that the family court had failed to apply the amended provisions of West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 correctly. The Supreme Court, however, found that the family court had correctly considered the child's best interests and also considered the father's increased participation in parenting his daughter.

As another allegation of error, the grandmother argued that the family court had erred when it failed to recognize her as the psychological parent of K.H. Rather, the family court had characterized the eight-year guardianship as "temporary." The Supreme Court discussed, in detail, the concept of a "psychological parent" and the cases addressing it. After reviewing the facts of the case, the Court found that the lower court had erred when it failed to recognize the grandmother as the psychological parent of K.H. The Court also held that K.H. and her grandmother had a right to continued association. Accordingly, the case was remanded to establish a visitation schedule between the child and her grandmother.

This case involved a dispute over the guardianship of a three-year-old girl, J.R. The parties to the case were the maternal grandfather and his wife (step-grandmother to J.R.) and the child's father. The child's mother had died in a car accident before the case was initiated. The child and her mother had lived with the maternal grandfather and step-grandmother for most of the child's young life. As a result of the mother's death, the maternal grandfather and his wife filed a guardianship petition. At an initial hearing, the parties agreed that the grandfather should serve as the guardian pending a final evidentiary hearing. The evidentiary hearing was not, however, conducted until over a year later.

At the evidentiary hearing, the grandparents presented evidence that the child's father had committed three acts of domestic violence against the child's mother. Specifically, a CPS worker and a deputy testified as to different acts of domestic violence that the father had perpetrated against J.R.'s mother. Ultimately, the circuit court found that the domestic violence was not relevant because the mother had died and the father was not currently in a relationship. Other testimony involved the child's worsened asthma as a result of exposure to secondhand smoke from the father, and the child's attachment to her step-grandmother.

Approximately three months after the evidentiary hearing was completed, the trial court denied the grandparents' guardianship petition. As a basis to deny the guardianship petition, the circuit court relied upon the syllabus of Whiteman v. Robinson, 116 S.E.2d 691 (W. Va. 1960), which indicates that a parent has a right to the custody of his or her child unless the parent is proven to be unfit. In its order, the circuit court found that the petitioners had failed to meet their burden to prove that the father was unfit and, therefore, denied the guardianship petition.

On appeal, the grandparents argued that the burden of proof should have been placed on the father pursuant to Syllabus Point 2 of Overfield v. Collins, 483 S.E.2d 27 (W. Va. 1996) and that the circuit court erred when it found that the domestic violence incidents were not relevant. In response, the father argued that the circuit was correct in finding him to be a fit parent.

To address these issues, the Court first discussed Whiteman, a case in which a father had left his child with an uncle for a relatively brief period of time when the child's mother died. In Whiteman, the Court noted that there was no evidence that the father had transferred custody of the child to the uncle. In addition, there was no evidence that the father was unfit. For that reason, the burden was placed on the proposed guardians to prove the father unfit.

The Court also discussed Overfield which involved a mother, who, after experiencing a traumatic injury, executed an affidavit that placed custody of a child with her parents. Suing to regain custody, the mother argued that the transfer of custody was intended to be temporary, and the grandparents argued that the transfer was intended to be permanent. In Overfield, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case and adopted Syllabus Point 2. This syllabus point indicates that when a parent transfers custody to a third person, he or she has the burden to prove his or her fitness as a parent. The burden then shifts to the third party to show that the child's placement should not be disturbed.

To resolve the instant case, the Court found that Syllabus Point 2 of Overfield should be applied, not the syllabus of Whiteman, because custody had been transferred to the grandparents. Secondly, the Court found that the allegations of domestic violence were relevant to the father's fitness as a parent. The Court remanded the case with instructions to apply Syllabus Point 2 of Overfield and to consider the evidence of the father's acts of domestic violence.

D. Supervised Visitation – Analysis of Best Interests

Syl. Pt. 3, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996); Syl. Pt. 4, In re Jason S., 219 W. Va. 485, 637 S.E.2d 583 (2006); Syl. Pt. 6, In re Marriage of Misty D.G., 221 W. Va. 144, 650 S.E.2d 243 (2007)

Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.

Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996); Syl. Pt. 3, In re Jason S., 219 W. Va. 485, 637 S.E.2d 583 (2006); Syl. Pt. 5, In re Marriage of Misty D.G., 221 W. Va. 144, 650 S.E.2d 243 (2007); Syl. Pt. 6, State ex rel. WV DHHR v. Ruckman, 223 W. Va. 368, 674 S.E.2d 229 (2009)

In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child.

Syl. Pt. 3, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992); Syl. Pt. 5, State ex rel. George B.W. v. Kaufman, 199 W. Va. 269, 483 S.E.2d 852 (1997) ; Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Isferding v. Canady, 199 W. Va. 209, 483 S.E.2d 555 (1997); Syl. Pt. 3, Alireza D. v. Kim Elaine W., 198 W. Va. 178, 479 S.E.2d 688 (1996); Syl. Pt. 3, Mary Ann P. v. William R.P., 197 W. Va. 1, 475 S.E.2d 1 (1996); Syl. Pt. 8, State ex rel. WV DHHR v. Ruckman, 223 W. Va. 368, 674 S.E.2d 229 (2009)

Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-2-15(b)(1), the best interest of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have a secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

Belinda Kay C. v. John David C., 193 W. Va. 196, 455 S.E.2d 565 (1995)

In custody cases, where there is evidence that a parent has on occasion demonstrated violent propensities and that his violence has, at least, disturbed his children, such evidence is sufficient to require restrictions on the parent's visitation, including, but not limited to, supervision. 455 S.E.2d at 566.

The best of the interest of the child must be the determining factor in assessing how supervision should be conducted. In order to require supervision it is not necessary to demonstrate that the parent has abused the child. Evidence of previous violent propensities as well as evidence that those propensities have had some impact on the parties' children is sufficient. 455 S.E.2d at 568.

E. Supervised Visitation – Requisite Finding and Standard of Proof

Syl. Pt. 2, in part, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992); Syl. Pt. 6, State ex rel. George B.W. v. Kaufman, 199 W. Va. 269, 483 S.E.2d 852 (1997)

Prior to ordering supervised visitation pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-2-15(b)(1), if there is an allegation involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law master or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law master or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law master or circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child. Furthermore, the family law master or circuit court should ascertain that the allegation of sexual abuse under these circumstances is meritorious and if made in the context of the family law proceeding, that such allegation is reported to the appropriate law enforcement agency or prosecutor for the county in which the alleged sexual abuse took place.

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Jason S., 219 W. Va. 485, 637 S.E.2d 583 (2006)

Prior to ordering supervised visitation … if there is an allegations involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law … [judge] or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law … [judge] or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law … [judge] or circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child.

F. Supervised Visitation During and After an Investigation Ordered by a Family Court

Syl. Pt. 9, State ex rel. WV DHHR v. Ruckman, 223 W. Va. 368, 674 S.E.2d 229 (2009)

A family court finding potential safety risks to minor children that warrant a court-ordered investigation pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 may not order visitation between a child and the party posing the potential risks while the investigation proceeds. Supervised visitation may be ordered following the investigation if the court finds the investigation or other information supplies the requisite credible evidentiary basis to believe a child's safety will be jeopardized if visitation is not supervised. Where supervised visitation is contemplated, the family court should schedule a hearing, with notice to all parties and any proposed supervisors, regarding the most suitable source for supervision under the circumstances. The purpose of the hearing is to determine the most appropriate source for supervision by considering (1) whether the child is comfortable and familiar with a potential supervisor through prior contact or otherwise, and (2) whether the potential supervisor is willing and has ability to fulfill the obligation. In order to provide an adequate basis for review, this determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family court judge in the order granting supervised visitation.

G. When Supervised Visitation No Longer Necessary

Syl. Pt. 4, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996)

If the protection of the children provided by supervised visitation is no longer necessary, either because the allegations that necessitated the supervision are determined to be without "credible evidence" (Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 348, 438 S.E.2d 521, 528 (1992)) or because the noncustodial parent had demonstrated a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated the supervision, the circuit court should gradually diminish the degree of supervision required with the ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation. The best interest of the children should determine the pace of any visitation modification to assure that the children's emotional and physical well being is not harmed.

ARTICLE 1. GENERAL PROVISIONS AND DEFINITIONS.

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS AND PURPOSE.

§ 49-1-101 Short title; intent of recodification.

(a) This chapter shall be known and may be cited as the "West Virginia Child Welfare Act."

(b) The recodification of this chapter during the regular session of the Legislature in the year 2015 is intended to embrace in a revised, consolidated, and codified form and arrangement the laws of the State of West Virginia relating to child welfare at the time of that enactment.

§ 49-1-102 Legislative Intent; continuation of existing statutory provisions; no increase in funding obligations.

In recodifying the child welfare law of this state during the regular session of the Legislature in the year 2015, it is intended by the Legislature that each specific reenactment of a substantively similar prior statutory provision will be construed as continuing the intended meaning of the corresponding prior statutory provision and any existing judicial interpretation of the prior statutory provision. It is not the intent of the Legislature, by recodifying the child welfare law of this state during the regular session of the Legislature in the year 2015 to alter the substantive law of this state as it relates to child welfare or to increase or enlarge any funding obligation of any spending unit of the state.

§ 49-1-103 Operative date of enactment; effect on existing law.

The amendment and reenactment of chapter forty-nine of this code, as enacted by the Legislature during the regular session, 2015, are operative ninety days from passage. The prior enactments of chapter forty-nine of this code, whether amended and reenacted or repealed by the action of the Legislature during the 2015 regular session, have full force and effect until that time.

§ 49-1-104 West Virginia Code replacement; no increase of funding obligations to be construed.

(a) The Department of Health and Human Resources and the Department of Military Affairs and Public Safety are not required to change any form or letter that contains a citation to this code that is changed or otherwise affected by the recodification of this chapter during the 2015 regular session of the Legislature unless specifically required by a provision of this code.

(b) No provision of the recodification of this chapter during the 2015 regular session of the Legislature may be construed to increase or enlarge any funding obligation of any spending unit of the state.

§ 49-1-105 Purpose.

(a) It is the purpose of this chapter to provide a system of coordinated child welfare and juvenile justice services for the children of this state. The state has a duty to assure that proper and appropriate care is given and maintained.

(b) The child welfare and juvenile justice system shall:

(1) Assure each child care, safety and guidance;

(2) Serve the mental and physical welfare of the child;

(3) Preserve and strengthen the child family ties;

(4) Recognize the fundamental rights of children and parents;

(5) Develop and establish procedures and programs which are family-focused rather than focused on specific family members, except where the best interests of the child or the safety of the community are at risk;

(6) Involve the child, the child's family or the child's caregiver in the planning and delivery of programs and services;

(7) Provide community-based services in the least restrictive settings that are consistent with the needs and potentials of the child and his or her family;

(8) Provide for early identification of the problems of children and their families, and respond appropriately to prevent abuse and neglect or delinquency;

(9) Provide for the rehabilitation of status offenders and juvenile delinquents;

(10) As necessary, provide for the secure detention of juveniles alleged or adjudicated delinquent;

(11) Provide for secure incarceration of children or juveniles adjudicated delinquent and committed to the custody of the director of the Division of Juvenile Services; and

(12) Protect the welfare of the general public.

(c) It is also the policy of this state to ensure that those persons and entities offering quality child care are not over-encumbered by licensure and registration requirements and that the extent of regulation of child care facilities and child placing agencies be moderately proportionate to the size of the facility.

(d) Through licensure, approval, and registration of child care, the state exercises its benevolent police power to protect the user of a service from risks against which he or she would have little or no competence for self protection. Licensure, approval, and registration processes shall, therefore, continually balance the child's rights and need for protection with the interests, rights and responsibility of the service providers.

§ 49-1-106 Location of child welfare services; state and federal cooperation; juvenile services.

(a) The child welfare service of the state shall be located within and administered by the Department of Health and Human Resources. The Division of Juvenile Services of the Department of Military Affairs and Public Safety shall administer the secure predispositional juvenile detention and juvenile correctional facilities of the state. Notwithstanding any other provision of this code to the contrary, the administrative authority of the Division of Juvenile Services over any child or juvenile in this state extends only to those detained or committed to a secure detention facility or secure correctional facility operated and maintained by the division by an order of a court of competent jurisdiction during the period of actual detention or confinement in the facility.

(b) The Department of Health and Human Resources is designated as the state entity to cooperate with the United States Department of Health and Human Services and United States Department of Justice in extending and improving child welfare services, to comply with federal regulations, and to receive and expend federal funds for these services. The Division of Juvenile Services of the Department of Military Affairs and Public Safety is designated as the state entity to cooperate with the United States Department of Health and Human Services and United States Department of Justice in operating, maintaining and improving juvenile correction facilities and centers for the predispositional detention of children, to comply with federal regulations, and to receive and expend federal funds for these services.

(c) The Division of Juvenile Services of the Department of Military Affairs and Public Safety is authorized to operate and maintain centers for juveniles needing detention pending disposition by a court having juvenile jurisdiction or temporary care following that court action.

PART II. DEFINITIONS.

§ 49-1-201 Definitions related, but not limited, to child abuse and neglect.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, child abuse and neglect, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

"Abandonment" means any conduct that demonstrates the settled purpose to forego the duties and parental responsibilities to the child;

"Abused child" means a child whose health or welfare is being harmed or threatened by:

(A) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home. Physical injury may include an injury to the child as a result of excessive corporal punishment;

(B) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation;

(C) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian in violation of section fourteen-h, article two, chapter sixty-one of this code; or

(D) Domestic violence as defined in section two hundred two, article twenty-seven, chapter forty-eight of this code.

"Abusing parent" means a parent, guardian or other custodian, regardless of his or her age, whose conduct has been adjudicated by the court to constitute child abuse or neglect as alleged in the petition charging child abuse or neglect.

"Battered parent," for the purposes of part six, article four of this chapter, means a respondent parent, guardian, or other custodian who has been adjudicated by the court to have not condoned the abuse or neglect and has not been able to stop the abuse or neglect of the child or children due to being the victim of domestic violence as defined by section two hundred two, article twenty-seven, chapter forty-eight of this code which was perpetrated by the same person or persons determined to have abused or neglected the child or children.

"Child abuse and neglect services" means social services which are directed toward:

(A) Protecting and promoting the welfare of children who are abused or neglected;

(B) Identifying, preventing and remedying conditions which cause child abuse and neglect;

(C) Preventing the unnecessary removal of children from their families by identifying family problems and assisting families in resolving problems which could lead to a removal of children and a breakup of the family;

(D) In cases where children have been removed from their families, providing time-limited reunification services to the children and the families so as to reunify those children with their families or some portion thereof;

(E) Placing children in suitable adoptive homes when reunifying the children with their families, or some portion thereof, is not possible or appropriate; and

(F) Assuring the adequate care of children or juveniles who have been placed in the custody of the department or third parties.

"Condition requiring emergency medical treatment" means a condition which, if left untreated for a period of a few hours, may result in permanent physical damage; that condition includes, but is not limited to, profuse or arterial bleeding, dislocation or fracture, unconsciousness and evidence of ingestion of significant amounts of a poisonous substance.

"Imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child" means an emergency situation in which the welfare or the life of the child is threatened. These conditions may include an emergency situation when there is reasonable cause to believe that any child in the home is or has been sexually abused or sexually exploited, or reasonable cause to believe that the following conditions threaten the health, life, or safety of any child in the home:

(A) Nonaccidental trauma inflicted by a parent, guardian, custodian, sibling or a babysitter or other caretaker;

(B) A combination of physical and other signs indicating a pattern of abuse which may be medically diagnosed as battered child syndrome;

(C) Nutritional deprivation;

(D) Abandonment by the parent, guardian or custodian;

(E) Inadequate treatment of serious illness or disease;

(F) Substantial emotional injury inflicted by a parent, guardian or custodian;

(G) Sale or attempted sale of the child by the parent, guardian or custodian;

(H) The parent, guardian or custodian's abuse of alcohol or drugs or other controlled substance as defined in section one hundred one, article one, chapter sixty-a of this code, has impaired his or her parenting skills to a degree as to pose an imminent risk to a child's health or safety; or

(I) Any other condition that threatens the health, life, or safety of any child in the home.

"Neglected child" means a child:

(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when that refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or

(B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian;

(C) "Neglected child" does not mean a child whose education is conducted within the provisions of section one, article eight, chapter eighteen of this code.

"Petitioner or co-petitioner" means the Department or any reputable person who files a child abuse or neglect petition pursuant to section six hundred one, article four, of this chapter.

"Permanency plan" means the part of the case plan which is designed to achieve a permanent home for the child in the least restrictive setting available.

"Respondent" means all parents, guardians, and custodians identified in the child abuse and neglect petition who are not petitioners or co-petitioners.

"Sexual abuse" means:

(A) Sexual intercourse, sexual intrusion, sexual contact, or conduct proscribed by section three, article eight-c, chapter sixty-one, which a parent, guardian or custodian engages in, attempts to engage in, or knowingly procures another person to engage in with a child notwithstanding the fact that for a child who is less than sixteen years of age the child may have willingly participated in that conduct or the child may have suffered no apparent physical injury or mental or emotional injury as a result of that conduct or, for a child sixteen years of age or older the child may have consented to that conduct or the child may have suffered no apparent physical injury or mental or emotional injury as a result of that conduct;

(B) Any conduct where a parent, guardian or custodian displays his or her sex organs to a child, or procures another person to display his or her sex organs to a child, for the purpose of gratifying the sexual desire of the parent, guardian or custodian, of the person making that display, or of the child, or for the purpose of affronting or alarming the child; or

(C) Any of the offenses proscribed in sections seven, eight or nine of article eight-b, chapter sixty-one of this code.

"Sexual assault" means any of the offenses proscribed in sections three, four or five of article eight-b, chapter sixty-one of this code.

"Sexual contact" means sexual contact as that term is defined in section one, article eight-b, chapter sixty-one of this code.

"Sexual exploitation" means an act where:

(A) A parent, custodian or guardian, whether for financial gain or not, persuades, induces, entices or coerces a child to engage in sexually explicit conduct as that term is defined in section one, article eight-c, chapter sixty-one of this code; or

(B) A parent, guardian or custodian persuades, induces, entices or coerces a child to display his or her sex organs for the sexual gratification of the parent, guardian, custodian or a third person, or to display his or her sex organs under circumstances in which the parent, guardian or custodian knows that the display is likely to be observed by others who would be affronted or alarmed.

"Sexual intercourse" means sexual intercourse as that term is defined in section one, article eight-b, chapter sixty-one of this code.

"Sexual intrusion" means sexual intrusion as that term is defined in section one, article eight-b, chapter sixty-one of this code.

"Serious physical abuse" means bodily injury which creates a substantial risk of death, which causes serious or prolonged disfigurement, prolonged impairment of health or prolonged loss or impairment of the function of any bodily organ.

§ 49-1-202 Definitions related, but not limited, to adult, child, developmental disability, and transitioning adult status.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, adult, child, developmental disability, and transitioning adult status, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

"Adult" means a person who is at least eighteen years of age.

"Child" or "Juvenile" means any person under eighteen years of age or is a transitioning adult. Once a child or juvenile is transferred to a court with criminal jurisdiction pursuant to section seven hundred ten, article four of this chapter, he or she shall remain a child or juvenile for the purposes of the applicability of this chapter. Unless otherwise stated, for the purpose of child care services "child" means an individual who meets one of the following conditions:

(A) Is under thirteen years of age;

(B) Is thirteen to eighteen years of age and under court supervision; or

(C) Is thirteen to eighteen years of age and presenting a significant delay of at least twenty-five percent in one or more areas of development, or a six month delay in two or more areas as determined by an early intervention program, special education program or other multidisciplinary team.

"Juvenile delinquent" means a juvenile who has been adjudicated as one who commits an act which would be a crime under state law or a municipal ordinance if committed by an adult.

"Status offender" means a juvenile who has been adjudicated as one:

(A) Who habitually and continually refuses to respond to the lawful supervision by his or her parents, guardian or legal custodian such that the juvenile's behavior substantially endangers the health, safety or welfare of the juvenile or any other person;

(B) Who has left the care of his or her parents, guardian or custodian without the consent of that person or without good cause; or

(C) Who is habitually absent from school without good cause.

"Transitioning adult" means an individual with a transfer plan to move to an adult setting who meets one of the following conditions:

(A) Is eighteen years of age but under twenty-one years of age, was in the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources upon reaching eighteen years of age and committed an act of delinquency before reaching eighteen years of age, remains under the jurisdiction of the juvenile court, and requires supervision and care to complete an education and or treatment program which was initiated prior to the eighteenth birthday; or

(B) Is eighteen years of age but under twenty-one years of age, was adjudicated abused, neglected, or in the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources upon reaching eighteen years of age and enters into a contract with the Department of Health and Human Resources to continue in an educational, training, or treatment program which was initiated prior to the eighteenth birthday.

§ 49-1-203 Definitions related, but not limited, to licensing and approval of programs.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, licensing and approval of programs, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

"Approval" means a finding by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources that a facility operated by the state has met the requirements of legislative rules promulgated for operation of that facility and that a Certificate of Approval or a Certificate of Operation has been issued.

"Certification of Approval" or "Certificate of Operation" means a statement issued by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources that a facility meets all of the necessary requirements for operation.

"Certificate of license" means a statement issued by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources authorizing an individual, corporation, partnership, voluntary association, municipality or county, or any agency thereof, to provide specified services for a limited period of time in accordance with the terms of the certificate.

"Certificate of registration" means a statement issued by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources to a family child care home, informal family child care home or relative family child care home, upon receipt of a self-certification statement of compliance with the legislative rules promulgated pursuant to this chapter.

"License" means the grant of official permission to a facility to engage in an activity which would otherwise be prohibited.

"Registration" means the process by which a family child care home, informal family child care home or a relative family child care home self-certifies compliance with the legislative rules promulgated pursuant to this chapter.

"Rule" means legislative rules promulgated by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources or a statement issued by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources of the standards to be applied in the various areas of child care.

"Variance" means a declaration that a rule may be accomplished in a manner different from the manner set forth in the rule.

"Waiver" means a declaration that a certain legislative rule is inapplicable in a particular circumstance.

§ 49-1-204 Definitions related, but not limited, to custodians, legal guardians and family.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, custodians, legal guardians and family, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

"Caregiver" means any person who is at least eighteen years of age and:

(A) Is related by blood, marriage or adoption to the minor, but who is not the legal custodian or guardian of the minor; or

(B) Has resided with the minor continuously during the immediately preceding period of six months or more.

"Custodian" means a person who has or shares actual physical possession or care and custody of a child, regardless of whether that person has been granted custody of the child by any contract or agreement.

"Dysfunctional family," for the purposes of part two, article two of this chapter, means a parent or parents or an adult or adults and a child or children living together and functioning in an impaired or abnormal manner so as to cause substantial physical or emotional danger, injury or harm to one or more children thereof regardless of whether those children are natural offspring, adopted children, step children or unrelated children to that parents.

"Legal or minor guardianship" means the permanent relationship between a child and a caretaker, established by order of the court having jurisdiction over the child or juvenile, pursuant to this chapter and chapter forty-four of this code.

"Parent" means an individual defined as a parent by law or on the basis of a biological relationship, marriage to a person with a biological relationship, legal adoption or other recognized grounds.

"Parental rights" means any and all rights and duties regarding a parent to a minor child.

"Parenting skills" means a parent's competency in providing physical care, protection, supervision and psychological support appropriate to a child's age and state of development.

"Siblings" means children who have at least one biological parent in common or who have been legally adopted by the same parent or parents.

§ 49-1-205 Definitions related, but not limited, to developmental disabilities.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, developmental disabilities, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

"Developmental disability" means a severe, chronic disability of a person which:

(A) Is attributable to a mental or physical impairment or a combination of mental and physical impairments;

(B) Is manifested before the person attains age twenty-two;

(C) Results in substantial functional limitations in three or more of the following areas of major life activity:

(i) Self-care;

(ii) Receptive and expressive language;

(iii) Learning;

(iv) Mobility;

(v) Self-direction;

(vi) Capacity for independent living; and

(vii) Economic self-sufficiency; and

(D) Reflects the person's need for services and supports which are of lifelong or extended duration and are individually planned and coordinated.

(E) The term "developmental disability", when applied to infants and young children, means individuals from birth to age five, inclusive, who have substantial developmental delays or specific congenital or acquired conditions with a high probability of resulting in developmental disabilities if services are not provided.

"Family or primary caregiver," for the purposes of part six, article two of this chapter, means the person or persons with whom the developmentally disabled person resides and who is primarily responsible for the physical care, education, health and nurturing of the disabled person pursuant to the provisions of part six, article two of this chapter. The term does not include hospitals, nursing homes, personal care homes or any other similar institution.

"Legal guardian," for the purposes of part six of article two of this chapter, means the person who is appointed legal guardian of a developmentally disabled person and who is responsible for the physical and financial aspects of caring for that person, regardless of whether the disabled person resides with his or her legal guardian or another family member.

§ 49-1-206 Definitions related, but not limited, to child advocacy, care, residential, and treatment programs.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, child advocacy, care, residential and treatment programs, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

"Child advocacy center (CAC)" means a community-based organization that is a member in good standing with the West Virginia Child Abuse Network, Inc., as set forth in section one hundred one, article three of this chapter.

"Child care" means responsibilities assumed and services performed in relation to a child's physical, emotional, psychological, social and personal needs and the consideration of the child's rights and entitlements, but does not include secure detention or incarceration under the jurisdiction of the Division of Juvenile Services pursuant to part nine, article two of this chapter. It includes the provision of child care services or residential services.

"Child care center" means a facility maintained by the state or any county or municipality thereof, or any agency or facility maintained by an individual, firm, corporation, association or organization, public or private for the care of thirteen or more children for child care services in any setting, if the facility is open for more than thirty days per year per child.

"Child care services" means direct care and protection of children during a portion of a twenty-four hour day outside of the child's own home which provides experiences to children that foster their healthy development and education.

"Child placing agency" means a child welfare agency organized for the purpose of placing children in private family homes for foster care or for adoption. The function of a child-placing agency may include the investigation and certification of foster family homes and foster family group homes as provided in this chapter. The function of a child placing agency may also include the supervision of children who are sixteen or seventeen years old and living in unlicensed residences.

"Child welfare agency" means any agency or facility maintained by the state or any county or municipality thereof, or any agency or facility maintained by an individual, firm, corporation, association or organization, public or private, to receive children for care and maintenance or for placement in residential care facilities, including, without limitation, private homes or any facility that provides care for unmarried mothers and their children. A child welfare agency does not include juvenile detention facilities or juvenile correctional facilities operated by or under contract with the Division of Juvenile Services, pursuant to part nine, article two of this chapter, nor any other facility operated by that division for the secure housing or holding of juveniles committed to its custody.

"Community based" means a facility, program or service located near the child's home or family and involving community participation in planning, operation and evaluation and which may include, but is not limited to, medical, educational, vocational, social and psychological guidance, training, special education, counseling, substance abuse and any other treatment or rehabilitation services.

"Community-based juvenile probation sanctions" means any of a continuum of nonresidential accountability measures, programs and sanctions in response to a technical violation of probation, as part of a system of community-based juvenile probation sanctions and incentives, that may include, but are not limited to:

(A) Electronic monitoring;

(B) Drug and alcohol screening, testing or monitoring;

(C) Youth reporting centers;

(D) Reporting and supervision requirements;

(E) Community service; and

(F) Rehabilitative interventions such as family counseling, substance abuse treatment, restorative justice programs and behavioral or mental health treatment.

"Community services" means nonresidential prevention or intervention services or programs that are intended to reduce delinquency and future court involvement.

"Evidence-based practices" means policies, procedures, programs and practices demonstrated by research to reliably produce reductions in the likelihood of reoffending.

"Facility" means a place or residence, including personnel, structures, grounds and equipment used for the care of a child or children on a residential or other basis for any number of hours a day in any shelter or structure maintained for that purpose. Facility does not include any juvenile detention facility or juvenile correctional facility operated by or under contract with the Division of Juvenile Services for the secure housing or holding of juveniles committed to its custody.

"Family child care facility" means any facility which is used to provide nonresidential child care services for compensation for seven to twelve children, including children who are living in the household, who are under six years of age. No more than four of the total number of children may be under twenty-four months of age. A facility may be in a provider's residence or a separate building.

"Family child care home" means a facility which is used to provide nonresidential child care services for compensation in a provider's residence. The provider may care for four to six children, at one time including children who are living in the household, who are under six years of age. No more than two of the total number of children may be under twenty-four months of age.

"Family resource network" means:

(A) A local community organization charged with service coordination, needs and resource assessment, planning, community mobilization and evaluation, and which has met the following criteria:

(i) Agreeing to a single governing entity;

(ii) Agreeing to engage in activities to improve service systems for children and families within the community;

(iii) Addressing a geographic area of a county or two or more contiguous counties;

(iv) Having nonproviders, which include family representatives and other members who are not employees of publicly funded agencies, as the majority of the members of the governing body, and having family representatives as the majority of the nonproviders;

(v) Having representatives of local service agencies, including, but not limited to, the public health department, the behavioral health center, the local health and human resources agency and the county school district, on the governing body; and

(vi) Accepting principles consistent with the cabinet's mission as part of its philosophy.

(B) A family resource network may not provide direct services, which means to provide programs or services directly to children and families.

"Family support", for the purposes of part six, article two of this chapter, means goods and services needed by families to care for their family members with developmental disabilities and to enjoy a quality of life comparable to other community members.

"Family support program" means a coordinated system of family support services administered by the Department of Health and Human Resources through contracts with behavioral health agencies throughout the state.

"Foster family home" means a private residence which is used for the care on a residential basis of no more than five children who are unrelated by blood, marriage or adoption to any adult member of the household.

"Health care and treatment" means:

(A) Developmental screening;

(B) Mental health screening;

(C) Mental health treatment;

(D) Ordinary and necessary medical and dental examination and treatment;

(E) Preventive care including ordinary immunizations, tuberculin testing and well-child care; and

(F) Nonemergency diagnosis and treatment. However, nonemergency diagnosis and treatment does not include an abortion.

"Home-based family preservation services" means services dispensed by the Division of Human Services or by another person, association or group who has contracted with that division to dispense services when those services are intended to stabilize and maintain the natural or surrogate family in order to prevent the placement of children in substitute care. There are two types of home-based family preservation services and they are as follows:

(A) Intensive, short-term intervention of four to six weeks; and

(B) Home-based, longer-term after care following intensive intervention.

"Informal family child care" means a home that is used to provide nonresidential child care services for compensation for three or fewer children, including children who are living in the household, who are under six years of age. Care is given in the provider's own home to at least one child who is not related to the caregiver.

"Nonsecure facility" means any public or private residential facility not characterized by construction fixtures designed to physically restrict the movements and activities of individuals held in lawful custody in that facility and which provides its residents access to the surrounding community with supervision.

"Nonviolent misdemeanor offense" means a misdemeanor offense that does not include any of the following:

(A) An act resulting in bodily injury or death;

(B) The use of a weapon in the commission of the offense;

(C) A domestic abuse offense involving a significant or likely risk of harm to a family member or household member;

(D) A criminal sexual conduct offense; or

(E) Any offense for driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs.

"Out-of-home placement" means a post-adjudication placement in a foster family home, group home, nonsecure facility, emergency shelter, hospital, psychiatric residential treatment facility, staff-secure facility, hardware secure facility, detention facility or other residential placement other than placement in the home of a parent, custodian or guardian.

"Out-of-school time" means a child care service which offers activities to children before and after school, on school holidays, when school is closed due to emergencies and on school calendar days set aside for teacher activities.

"Placement" means any temporary or permanent placement of a child who is in the custody of the state in any foster home, group home or other facility or residence.

"Pre-adjudicatory community supervision" means supervision provided to a youth prior to adjudication, a period of supervision up to one year for an alleged status or delinquency offense.

"Regional family support council" means the council established by the regional family support agency to carry out the responsibilities specified in part six, article two of this chapter.

"Relative family child care" means a home that provides nonresidential child care services only to children related to the caregiver. The caregiver is a grandparent, great grandparent, aunt, uncle, great-aunt, great-uncle or adult sibling of the child or children receiving care. Care is given in the provider's home.

"Residential services" means child care which includes the provision of nighttime shelter and the personal discipline and supervision of a child by guardians, custodians or other persons or entities on a continuing or temporary basis. It may include care and/or treatment for transitioning adults. Residential services does not include or apply to any juvenile detention facility or juvenile correctional facility operated by the Division of Juvenile Services, created pursuant to this chapter, for the secure housing or holding of juveniles committed to its custody.

"Risk and needs assessment" means a validated, standardized actuarial tool which identifies specific risk factors that increase the likelihood of reoffending and the factors that, when properly addressed, can reduce the likelihood of reoffending.

"Secure facility" means any public or private residential facility which includes construction fixtures designed to physically restrict the movements and activities of juveniles or other individuals held in lawful custody in such facility.

"Staff-secure facility" means any public or private residential facility characterized by staff restrictions of the movements and activities of individuals held in lawful custody in such facility and which limits its residents' access to the surrounding community, but is not characterized by construction fixtures designed to physically restrict the movements and activities of residents.

"Standardized screener" means a brief, validated nondiagnostic inventory or questionnaire designed to identify juveniles in need of further assessment for medical, substance abuse, emotional, psychological, behavioral, or educational issues, or other conditions.

"State family support council" means the council established by the Department of Health and Human Resources pursuant to part six, article two of this chapter to carry out the responsibilities specified in article two of this chapter.

"Time-limited reunification services" means individual, group and family counseling, inpatient, residential or outpatient substance abuse treatment services, mental health services, assistance to address domestic violence, services designed to provide temporary child care and therapeutic services for families, including crisis nurseries and transportation to or from those services, provided during fifteen of the most recent twenty-two months a child or juvenile has been in foster care, as determined by the earlier date of the first judicial finding that the child is subjected to abuse or neglect, or the date which is sixty days after the child or juvenile is removed from home.

"Technical violation" means an act that violates the terms or conditions of probation or a court order that does not constitute a new delinquent offense.

"Truancy diversion specialist" means a school-based probation officer or truancy social worker within a school or schools who, among other responsibilities, identifies truants and the causes of the truant behavior, and assists in developing a plan to reduce the truant behavior prior to court involvement.

§ 49-1-207 Definitions related to court actions.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, court actions, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

"Court" means the circuit court of the county with jurisdiction of the case or the judge in vacation unless otherwise specifically provided.

"Court appointed special advocate (CASA) program" means a community organization that screens, trains and supervises CASA volunteers to advocate for the best interests of children who are involved in abuse and neglect proceedings section one hundred two, article three of this chapter.

"Extrajudicial Statement" means any utterance, written or oral, which was made outside of court.

"Multidisciplinary team" means a group of professionals and paraprofessionals representing a variety of disciplines who interact and coordinate their efforts to identify, diagnose and treat specific cases of child abuse and neglect. Multidisciplinary teams may include, but are not limited to, medical, educational, child care and law-enforcement personnel, social workers, psychologists and psychiatrists. Their goal is to pool their respective skills in order to formulate accurate diagnoses and to provide comprehensive coordinated treatment with continuity and follow-up for both parents and children.

"Community team" means a multidisciplinary group which addresses the general problem of child abuse and neglect in a given community and may consist of several multidisciplinary teams with different functions.

"Res gestae" means a spontaneous declaration made by a person immediately after an event and before the person has had an opportunity to conjure a falsehood.

"Valid court order" means an order issued by a court of competent jurisdiction relating to a child brought before the court and who is the subject of that order. Prior to the entry of the order the child shall have received the full due process rights guaranteed to that child or juvenile by the Constitutions of the United States and the State of West Virginia.

"Violation of a traffic law of West Virginia" means a violation of chapter seventeen-a, seventeen-b, seventeen-c or seventeen-d of this code except a violation of section one or two, article four, chapter seventeen-c of this code relating to hit and run or section one, two or three, article five of that chapter, relating, respectively, to negligent homicide, driving under the influence of alcohol, controlled substances or drugs and reckless driving.

§ 49-1-208 Definitions related, but not limited, to state and local agencies.

When used in this chapter, terms defined in this section have the meanings ascribed to them that relate to, but are not limited to, state and local agencies, except in those instances where a different meaning is provided or the context in which the word is used clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

ARTICLE 2. STATE RESPONSIBILITIES FOR CHILDREN.

PART I. GENERAL AUTHORITY AND DUTIES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN RESOURCES

§ 49-2-101 Authorization and responsibility.

(a) The Department of Health and Human Resources is authorized to provide care, support and protective services for children who are handicapped by dependency, neglect, single parent status, mental or physical disability, or who for other reasons are in need of public service. The department is also authorized to accept children for care from their parent or parents, guardian, custodian or relatives and to accept the custody of children committed to its care by courts. The Department of Health and Human Resources or any county office of the department is also authorized and to accept temporary custody of children for care from any law-enforcement officer in an emergency situation.

(b) The Department of Health and Human Resources is responsible for the care of the infant child of an unmarried mother who has been committed to the custody of the department while the infant is placed in the same licensed child welfare agency as his or her mother. The department may provide care for those children in family homes meeting required standards, at board or otherwise, through a licensed child welfare agency, or in a state institution providing care for dependent or neglected children. If practical, when placing any child in the care of a family or a child welfare agency the department shall select a family holding the same religious belief as the parents or relatives of the child or a child welfare agency conducted under religious auspices of the same belief as the parents or relatives.

§ 49-2-102 Minimum staffing complement for child protective services.

For the sole purpose of increasing the number of full time front line child protective service case workers and investigators, the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources shall have the authority to transfer funds between all general revenue accounts under the secretary's authority and/or between personnel and nonpersonnel lines within each account under the secretary's authority. Nothing in this section shall be construed to require the department to hire additional child protective service workers at any time if the department determines that funds are not available for those workers. Additionally, the secretary shall prepare a plan to allow the department to progressively reduce caseload standards in West Virginia for child protective services workers, which if adopted by the Legislature during the regular session of 1995, shall require implementation no later than July 1, 1996, with the plan to be submitted to the joint committee on government and finance by the September 30, 1994, and a final report to be submitted to the Legislature by January 1, 1995.

§ 49-2-103 Proceedings by the state department.

The state department shall have the authority to institute, in the name of the state, proceedings incident to the performance of its duties under the provisions of this chapter.

§ 49-2-104 Education of the public.

The secretary shall provide ongoing education of the public in regard to the requirements of this chapter through the use of mass media and other methods as are deemed appropriate and within fiscal limitations.

§ 49-2-105 Administrative and judicial review.

Any person, corporation, governmental official or child welfare agency, aggrieved by a decision of the secretary made pursuant to this chapter may contest the decision upon making a request for a hearing by the secretary within thirty days of receipt of notice of the decision. Administrative and judicial review shall be made in accordance with article five, chapter twenty-nine-a of this code. Any decision issued by the secretary may be made effective from the date of issuance. Immediate relief therefrom may be obtained upon a showing of good cause made by verified petition to the Circuit Court of Kanawha County or the circuit court of any county where the affected facility or child welfare agency may be located. The dependency of administrative or judicial review shall not prevent the secretary from obtaining injunctive relief pursuant to section one hundred twenty, article two of this chapter.

§ 49-2-106 Department responsibility for foster care homes.

It is the responsibility of the Department of Health and Human Resources to provide care for neglected children who are committed to its care for custody or guardianship. The department may provide this care for children in family homes meeting required standards of certification established and enforced by the Department of Health and Human Resources.

§ 49-2-107 Foster-home care; minimum standards; certificate of operation; inspection.

(a) The department shall establish minimum standards for foster-home care to which all certified foster homes must conform by legislative rule. Any home that conforms to the standards of care set by the department shall receive a certificate of operation.

(b) The certificate of operation shall be in force for one year from the date of issuance and may be renewed unless revoked because of willful violation of this chapter.

(c) The certificate shall show the name of the person or persons authorized to conduct the home, its exact location and the number of children that may be received and cared for at one time and other information as set forth in legislative rule. No certified foster home shall provide care for more children than are specified in the certificate.

(d) No unsupervised foster home shall be certified until an investigation of the home and its standards of care has been made by the department or by a licensed child welfare agency serving as a representative of the department.

§ 49-2-108 Visits and inspections; records.

The department or its authorized agent shall visit and inspect every certified foster home as often as is necessary to assure proper care is given to the children. Every certified foster home shall maintain a record of the children received. This record shall include information as prescribed by the department in legislative rule and shall be in a form and manner as prescribed by the department in legislative rule.

§ 49-2-109 Placing children from other states in private homes of state.

An institution or organization incorporated under the laws of another state shall not place a child in a private home in the state without the approval of the department, and the agency so placing the child shall arrange for supervision of the child through its own staff or through a licensed child welfare agency in this state, and shall maintain responsibility for the child until he or she is adopted or discharged from care with the approval of the department.

§ 49-2-110 Development of standards of child care.

The department shall develop standards for the care of children. It shall cooperate with, advise and assist all child welfare agencies, including state institutions, which care for neglected, delinquent, or mentally or physically handicapped children, and shall supervise those agencies. The department, in cooperation with child welfare agencies, shall formulate and make available standards of child care and services for children, to which all child welfare agencies must conform.

§ 49-2-111 Supervision of child welfare agencies by the department; records and reports.

(a) In order to improve standards of child care, the department shall cooperate with the governing boards of child welfare agencies, assist the staffs of those agencies through advice on progressive methods and procedures of child care and improvement of the service rendered, and assist in the development of community plans of child care. The department, or its duly authorized agent, may visit any child welfare agency to advise the agency on matters affecting the health of children and to inspect the sanitation of the buildings used for their care.

(b) Each child welfare agency shall keep records of each child under its control and care as the department may prescribe, and shall report to the department, whenever requested, facts as may be required with reference to the children, upon forms furnished by the department. All records regarding children and all facts learned about children and their parents or relatives shall be regarded as confidential and shall be properly safeguarded by the agency and the department.

§ 49-2-112 Family homes; approval of incorporation by Secretary of State; approval of articles of incorporation.

(a) Before issuing a charter for the incorporation of any organization having as its purpose the receipt of children for care or for placement in family homes, the Secretary of State shall provide a copy of the petition, together with any other information in his or her possession pertaining to the proposed corporation, to the secretary, and no charter for a corporation may be issued unless the secretary shall first certify to the Secretary of State that it has investigated the need for the services proposed and the merits of the proposed charitable corporation and recommends the issuance thereof; applications for amendments of any existing charter shall be similarly referred and shall be granted only upon similar approval.

(b) A child welfare agency may not be incorporated in this state unless the articles of incorporation have first been examined and approved by the secretary, or his or her designee. Proposed amendments to articles of incorporation shall be subject to the examination and approval of the secretary, or his or her designee.

§ 49-2-113 Residential child care centers; licensure, certification, approval and registration; requirements.

(a) Any person, corporation or child welfare agency, other than a state agency, which operates a residential child care center shall obtain a license from the department.

(b) Any residential child care facility, day care center or any child-placing agency operated by the state shall obtain approval of its operations from the secretary.

(c) Any family day care facility which operates in this state, including family day care facilities approved by the department for receipt of funding, shall obtain a statement of certification from the department.

(d) Every family day care home which operates in this state, including family day care homes approved by the department for receipt of funding, shall obtain a certificate of registration from the department. The facilities and placing agencies shall maintain the same standards of care applicable to licensed facilities, centers or placing agencies of the same category.

(e) This section does not apply to:

(1) A kindergarten, preschool or school education program which is operated by a public school or which is accredited by the state Department of Education, or any other kindergarten, preschool or school programs which operate with sessions not exceeding four hours per day for any child;

(2) An individual or facility which offers occasional care of children for brief periods while parents are shopping, engaging in recreational activities, attending religious services or engaging in other business or personal affairs;

(3) Summer recreation camps operated for children attending sessions for periods not exceeding thirty days;

(4) Hospitals or other medical facilities which are primarily used for temporary residential care of children for treatment, convalescence or testing;

(5) Persons providing family day care solely for children related to them;

(6) Any juvenile detention facility or juvenile correctional facility operated by or under contract with the Division of Juvenile Services for the secure housing or holding of juveniles committed to its custody;

(7) Any out-of-school time program that has been awarded a grant by the West Virginia Department of Education to provide out-of-school time programs to kindergarten through twelfth grade students when the program is monitored by the West Virginia Department of Education; or

(8) Any out-of-school time program serving children six years of age or older and meets all of the following requirements, or is an out-of-school time program that is affiliated and in good standing with a national Congressionally chartered organization and meets all of the following requirements:

(A) The program is located in a facility that meets all fire and health codes;

(B) The program performs background checks on all volunteers and staff;

(C) The program's primary source of funding is not from fees for service; and

(D) The program has a formalized monitoring system in place.

(f) The secretary is authorized to issue an emergency rule relating to conducting a survey of existing facilities in this state in which children reside on a temporary basis in order to ascertain whether they should be subject to licensing under this article or applicable licensing provisions relating to behavioral health treatment providers.

(g) Any informal family child care home or relative family child care home may voluntarily register and obtain a certificate of registration from the department.

(h) All facilities or programs that provide out-of-school time care shall register with the department upon commencement of operations and on an annual basis thereafter. The department shall obtain information, such as the name of the facility or program, the description of the services provided and any other information relevant to the determination by the department as to whether the facility or program meets the criteria for exemption under this section.

(i) Any child care service that is licensed or receives a certificate of registration shall have a written plan for evacuation in the event of fire, natural disaster or other threatening situation that may pose a health or safety hazard to the children in the child care service.

(1) The plan shall include, but not be limited to:

(A) A designated relocation site and evacuation;

(B) Procedures for notifying parents of the relocation and ensuring family reunification;

(C) Procedures to address the needs of individual children including children with special needs;

(D) Instructions relating to the training of staff or the reassignment of staff duties, as appropriate;

(E) Coordination with local emergency management officials; and

(F) A program to ensure that appropriate staff are familiar with the components of the plan.

(2) A child care service shall update the evacuation plan by December 31, of each year. If a child care service fails to update the plan, no action shall be taken against the child care service's license or registration until notice is provided and the child care service is given thirty days after the receipt of notice to provide an updated plan.

(3) A child care service shall retain an updated copy of the plan for evacuation and shall provide notice of the plan and notification that a copy of the plan will be provided upon request to any parent, custodian or guardian of each child at the time of the child's enrollment in the child care service and when the plan is updated.

(4) All child care centers and family child care facilities shall provide the plan and each updated copy of the plan to the Director of the Office of Emergency Services in the county where the center or facility is located.

§ 49-2-114 Application for license or approval.

(a) Any person or corporation or any governmental agency intending to act as a child welfare agency shall apply for a license, approval or registration certificate to operate child care facilities regulated by this chapter. Applications for licensure, approval or registration shall be made separately for each child care facility to be licensed, approved, certified or registered.

(b) The secretary shall prescribe by legislative rule forms and reasonable application procedures including, but not limited to, fingerprinting of applicants and other persons responsible for the care of children for submission to the State Police and, if necessary, to the Federal Bureau of Investigation for criminal history record checks.

(c) Before issuing a license, or approval, the secretary shall investigate the facility, program and persons responsible for the care of children. The investigation shall include, but not be limited to, review of resource need, reputation, character and purposes of applicants, a check of personnel criminal records, if any, and personnel medical records, the financial records of applicants, review of the facilities emergency evacuation plan and consideration of the proposed plan for child care from intake to discharge.

(d) Before a home registration is granted, the secretary shall make inquiry as to the facility, program and persons responsible for the care of children. The inquiry shall include self-certification by the prospective home of compliance with standards including, but not limited to:

(1) Physical and mental health of persons present in the home while children are in care;

(2) Criminal and child abuse or neglect history of persons present in the home while children are in care;

(3) Discipline;

(4) Fire and environmental safety;

(5) Equipment and program for the children in care; and

(6) Health, sanitation and nutrition.

(e) Further inquiry and investigation may be made as the secretary may direct and sees as necessary.

(f) The secretary shall make a decision on each application within sixty days of its receipt and shall provide to unsuccessful applicants written reasons for the decision.

§ 49-2-115 Conditions of licensure, approval and registration.

(a) A license or approval is effective for a period up to two years from the date of issuance, unless revoked or modified to provisional status based on evidence of a failure to comply with this chapter or any legislative rules promulgated by the secretary. The license or approval shall be reinstated upon application to the secretary and a determination of compliance.

(b) An initial six-month license or approval shall be issued to an applicant establishing a new service found to be in compliance on initial review with regard to policy, procedure, organization, risk management, human resources, service environment and record keeping regulations.

(c) A provisional license or approval may be issued when a licensee is not in compliance with the legislative rules promulgated by the secretary but does not pose a significant risk to the rights, well-being, health and safety of a consumer. It shall expire not more than six months from date of issuance, and not be consecutively reissued unless the provisional recommendation is that of the State Fire Marshal.

(d) A renewal license or approval may be issued of any duration up to two years at the discretion of the secretary. In the event a renewal license is not issued, the facility must make discharge plans for residents and cease operation within thirty days of the expiration of the license.

(e) A certificate of registration is effective for a period up to two years from the date of issuance, unless revoked based on evidence of a failure to comply with this article or any rules promulgated pursuant to this article. The certificate of registration shall be reinstated upon application to the secretary, including a statement of assurance of continued compliance with the legislative rules promulgated pursuant to this article.

(f) The license, approval or registration issued under this article is not transferable and applies only to the facility and its location stated in the application. The license, registration or approval shall be publicly displayed. The foster and adoptive family homes, informal family child care homes and relative family child care homes shall be required to display registration certificates of registration or approval upon request rather than by posting.

(g) Provisional certificates of registration may be issued to family child care homes.

(h) The secretary, as a condition of issuing a license, registration or approval, may:

(1) Limit the age, sex or type of problems of children allowed admission to a particular facility;

(2) Prohibit intake of any children; or

(3) Reduce the number of children which the agency, facility or home operated by the agency is licensed, approved, certified or registered to receive.

§ 49-2-116 Investigative authority; evaluation; complaint.

(a) The secretary shall enforce this article.

(b) An on-site evaluation of every facility regulated pursuant to this chapter, except registered family child care homes, informal family child care and relative family child care homes shall be conducted no less than once per year by announced or unannounced visits.

(c) A random sample of not less than five percent of the total number of registered family child care homes, informal family child care homes and relative family child care homes shall be monitored annually through on-site evaluations.

(d) The secretary shall have access to the premises, personnel, children in care and records of each facility subject to inspection, including at a minimum, case records, corporate and financial records and board minutes. Applicants for licenses, approvals, and certificates of registration shall consent to reasonable on-site administrative inspections, made with or without prior notice, as a condition of licensing, approval, or registration.

(e) When a complaint is received by the secretary alleging violations of licensure, approval, or registration requirements, the secretary shall investigate the allegations. The secretary may notify the facility's director before or after a complaint is investigated and shall cause a written report of the results of the investigation to be made.

(f) The secretary may enter any unlicensed, unregistered or unapproved child care facility or personal residence for which there is probable cause to believe that the facility or residence is operating in violation of this article. Those entries shall be made with a law-enforcement officer present. The secretary may enter upon the premises of any unregistered residence only after two attempts by the secretary to bring this facility into compliance.

§ 49-2-117 Revocation; provisional licensure and approval.

(a) The secretary may revoke or make provisional the licensure registration of any home facility or child welfare agency regulated pursuant to this chapter if a facility materially violates this article, or any terms or conditions of the license, registration or approval issued, or fails to maintain established requirements of child care. This section does not apply to family child care homes.

(b) The secretary may revoke the certificate of registration of any family child care home if a facility materially violates this article, or any terms or conditions of the registration certificate issued, or fails to maintain established requirements of child care.

§ 49-2-118 Closing of facilities by the secretary; placement of children.

When the secretary finds that the operation of a facility constitutes an immediate danger of serious harm to children served by the facility, the secretary shall issue an order of closure terminating operation of the facility. When necessary, the secretary shall place or direct the placement of the children in a residential facility which has been closed into appropriate facilities. A facility closed by the secretary may not operate pending administrative or judicial review without court order.

§ 49-2-119 Supervision; consultation; State Fire Marshall to cooperate.

(a) The secretary shall provide supervision to ascertain compliance with the rules promulgated pursuant to this chapter through regular monitoring, visits to facilities, documentation, evaluation and reporting. The secretary is responsible for training and education, within fiscal limitations, specifically for the improvement of care in family child care homes and facilities. The secretary shall consult with applicants, the personnel of child welfare agencies, and children under care to assure the highest quality child care possible.

(b) The State Fire Marshal shall cooperate with the secretary in the administration of this article by providing reports and assistance as may be requested by the secretary.

§ 49-2-120 Penalties; injunctions; venue.

(a) Any individual or corporation which operates a child welfare agency, residential facility or child care center without a license when a license is required is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be confined in jail not exceeding one year, or fined not more than $500, or both fined and confined.

(b) Any family child care facility which operates without a license when a license is required is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $500.

(c) Where a violation of this article or a legislative rule promulgated by the secretary may result in serious harm to children under care, the secretary may seek injunctive relief against any person, corporation, child welfare agency, child placing agency, child care center, family child care facility, family child care home or governmental official through proceedings instituted by the Attorney General, or the appropriate county prosecuting attorney, in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County or in the circuit court of any county where the children are residing or may be found.

§ 49-2-121 Rule-making.

(a) The secretary shall promulgate legislative rules in accordance with chapter twenty-nine-a of this code regarding the licensure, approval, certification and registration of child care facilities and the implementation of this article. The rules shall provide at a minimum the requirement that every residential child care facility shall be subject to an annual time study regarding the quantification of staff supervision time at each facility. Every residential child care facility shall participate in the time study at the request of the department.

(b) The secretary shall review the rules promulgated pursuant to this article at least once every five years, making revisions when necessary or convenient.

(c) The rules shall incorporate by reference the requirements of the Integrated Pest Management Program established by legislative rule by the Department of Agriculture under section four, article sixteen-a, chapter nineteen of this code.

§ 49-2-122 Waivers and variances to rules.

Waivers or variances of rules may be granted by the secretary if the health, safety or well-being of a child would not be endangered thereby. The secretary shall promulgate by legislative rule criteria and procedures for the granting of waivers or variances so that uniform practices may be maintained throughout the state.

§ 49-2-123 Annual reports; directory; licensing reports and recommendations.

(a) The secretary shall submit on or before January 1, of each year a report to the Governor and the Legislative Oversight Commission on Health and Human Resources Accountability, concerning the regulation of child welfare agencies, child placing agencies, child care centers, family child care facilities, family child care homes, informal family child care homes, relative family child care homes and child care facilities during the year. The report shall include at a minimum, data on the number of children and staff at each facility (except family child care, informal family child care homes and relative family child care), applications received, types of licenses, approvals and registrations granted, denied, made provisional or revoked and any injunctions obtained or facility closures ordered.

(b) The secretary also shall compile annually a directory of licensed, certified and approved child care providers including a brief description of their program and facilities, the program's capacity and a general profile of children served. A listing of family child care homes shall also be compiled annually.

(c) Licensing reports and recommendations for licensure which are a part of the yearly review of each licensed facility shall be sent to the facility director. Copies shall be available to the public upon written request to the secretary.

§ 49-2-124 Certificate of need not required; conditions; review.

(a) A certificate of need, as provided in article two-d, chapter sixteen of this code, is not required by an entity proposing behavioral health care facilities or behavioral health care services for children who are placed out of their home, or who are at imminent risk of being placed out of their home, if a summary review is performed in accordance with this section.

(b) A summary review of proposed health care facilities or health care services for children who are placed out of their home, or who are at imminent risk of being placed out of their home, is initiated when the proposal is recommended to the health care cost review authority by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources and the secretary has made the following findings:

(1) That the proposed facility or service is consistent with the state health plan;

(2) That the proposed facility or service is consistent with the department's programmatic and fiscal plan for behavioral health services for children with mental health and addiction disorders;

(3) That the proposed facility or service contributes to providing services that are child and family driven, with priority given to keeping children in their own homes;

(4) That the proposed facility or service will contribute to reducing the number of child placements in out-of-state facilities by making placements available in in-state facilities;

(5) That the proposed facility or service contributes to reducing the number of child placements in in-state or out-of-state facilities by returning children to their families, placing them in foster care programs or making available school-based and out-patient services; and

(6) If applicable, that the proposed services will be community-based, locally accessible and provided in an appropriate setting consistent with the unique needs and potential of each child and his or her family.

(c) The secretary's findings required by subsection (b) of this section shall be filed with the secretary's recommendation and appropriate documentation. If the secretary's findings are supported by the accompanying documentation, the proposal shall not require a certificate of need.

(d) Any entity that does not qualify for summary review shall be subject to certificate of need review.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of law to the contrary, the provision of regular or therapeutic foster care services does not constitute a behavioral health care facility or a behavioral health care service that would subject it to the summary review procedure established in this section or to the certificate of need requirements provided in article two-d, chapter sixteen of this code.

§ 49-2-125 Commission to Study Residential Placement of Children; findings; requirements; reports; recommendations; termination.

(a) The Legislature finds that the state's current system of serving children and families in need of or at risk of needing social, emotional and behavioral health services is fragmented. The existing categorical structure of government programs and their funding streams discourages collaboration, resulting in duplication of efforts and a waste of limited resources. Children are usually involved in multiple child-serving systems, including child welfare, juvenile justice and special education. More than ten percent of children presently in care are presently in out-of-state placements. Earlier efforts at reform have focused on quick fixes for individual components of the system at the expense of the whole. It is the purpose of this section to establish a mechanism to achieve systemic reform by which all of the state's child-serving agencies involved in the residential placement of at-risk youth jointly and continually study and improve upon this system and make recommendations to their respective agencies and to the Legislature regarding funding and statutory, regulatory and policy changes. It is further the Legislature's intent to build upon these recommendations to establish an integrated system of care for at-risk youth and families that makes prudent and cost-effective use of limited state resources by drawing upon the experience of successful models and best practices in this and other jurisdictions, which focuses on delivering services in the least restrictive setting appropriate to the needs of the child, and which produces better outcomes for children, families and the state.

(b) There is created within the Department of Health and Human Resources the Commission to Study the Residential Placement of Children. The commission consists of the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources, the Commissioner of the Bureau for Children and Families, the Commissioner for the Bureau for Behavioral Health and Health Facilities, the Commissioner for the Bureau for Medical Services, the State Superintendent of Schools, a representative of local educational agencies, the Director of the Office of Institutional Educational Programs, the Director of the Office of Special Education Programs and Assurance, the Director of the Division of Juvenile Services and the Executive Director of the Prosecuting Attorney's Institute. At the discretion of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals, circuit and family court judges and other court personnel, including the Administrator of the Supreme Court of Appeals and the Director of the Juvenile Probation Services Division, may serve on the commission. These statutory members may further designate additional persons in their respective offices who may attend the meetings of the commission if they are the administrative head of the office or division whose functions necessitate their inclusion in this process. In its deliberations, the commission shall also consult and solicit input from families and service providers.

(c) The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources shall serve as chair of the commission, which shall meet on a quarterly basis at the call of the chair.

(d) At a minimum, the commission shall study:

(1) The current practices of placing children out-of-home and into in-residential placements, with special emphasis on out-of-state placements;

(2) The adequacy, capacity, availability and utilization of existing in-state facilities to serve the needs of children requiring residential placements;

(3) Strategies and methods to reduce the number of children who must be placed in out-of-state facilities and to return children from existing out-of-state placements, initially targeting older youth who have been adjudicated delinquent;

(4) Staffing, facilitation and oversight of multidisciplinary treatment planning teams;

(5) The availability of and investment in community-based, less restrictive and less costly alternatives to residential placements;

(6) Ways in which up-to-date information about in-state placement availability may be made readily accessible to state agency and court personnel, including an interactive secure web site;

(7) Strategies and methods to promote and sustain cooperation and collaboration between the courts, state and local agencies, families and service providers, including the use of inter-agency memoranda of understanding, pooled funding arrangements and sharing of information and staff resources;

(8) The advisability of including "no-refusal" clauses in contracts with in-state providers for placement of children whose treatment needs match the level of licensure held by the provider;

(9) Identification of in-state service gaps and the feasibility of developing services to fill those gaps, including funding;

(10) Identification of fiscal, statutory and regulatory barriers to developing needed services in-state in a timely and responsive way;

(11) Ways to promote and protect the rights and participation of parents, foster parents and children involved in out-of-home care;

(12) Ways to certify out-of-state providers to ensure that children who must be placed out-of-state receive high quality services consistent with this state's standards of licensure and rules of operation; and

(13) Any other ancillary issue relative to foster care placement.

(e) The commission shall report annually to the Legislative Oversight Commission on Health and Human Resources Accountability its conclusions and recommendations, including an implementation plan whereby:

(1) Out-of-state placements shall be reduced by at least ten percent per year and by at least fifty percent within three years;

(2) Child-serving agencies shall develop joint operating and funding proposals to serve the needs of children and families that cross their jurisdictional boundaries in a more seamless way;

(3) Steps shall be taken to obtain all necessary federal plan waivers or amendments in order for agencies to work collaboratively while maximizing the availability of federal funds;

(4) Agencies shall enter into memoranda of understanding to assume joint responsibilities;

(5) System of care components and cooperative relationships shall be incrementally established at the local, state and regional levels, with links to existing resources, such as family resource networks and regional summits, wherever possible; and

(6) Recommendations for changes in fiscal, statutory and regulatory provisions are included for legislative action.

(f) The commission shall terminate on December 31, 2015, unless continued by act of the Legislature.

§ 49-2-126. Legislative findings and declaration of intent for goals for foster children.

(a) The Legislature finds and declares that the design and delivery of child welfare services should be directed by the principle that the health and safety of children should be of paramount concern and, therefore, establishes the goals for children in foster care. A child in foster care should have:

(1) Protection by a family of his or her own, and be provided readily available services and support through care of an adoptive family or by plan, a continuing foster family;

(2) Nurturing by foster parents who have been selected to meet his or her individual needs, and who are provided services and support, including specialized education, so that the child can grow to reach his or her potential;

(3) A safe foster home free of violence, abuse, neglect and danger;

(4) The ability to communicate with the assigned social worker or case worker overseeing the child's case and have calls made to the social worker or case worker returned within a reasonable period of time;

(5) Permission to remain enrolled in the school the child attended before being placed in foster care, if at all possible;

(6) Participation in school extracurricular activities, community events, and religious practices;

(7) Communication with the biological parents. Communication is necessary if the child placed in foster care receives any immunizations and if any additional immunizations are needed, if the child will be transitioning back into a home with his or her biological parents;

(8) A bank or savings account established in accordance with state laws and federal regulations;

(9) Identification and other permanent documents, including a birth certificate, social security card and health records by the age of sixteen, to the extent allowed by federal and state law;

(10) The use of appropriate communication measures to maintain contact with siblings if the child placed in foster care is separated from his or her siblings; and

(11) Meaningful participation in a transition plan for those phasing out of foster care.

(b) A person shall not have a cause of action against the state or any of its subdivisions, agencies, contractors, subcontractors, or agents, based upon the adoption of or failure to provide adequate funding for the achievement of these goals by the Legislature. Nothing in this section requires the expenditure of funds to meet the goals established in this section, except funds specifically appropriated for that purpose.

(c) The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources shall propose rules for promulgation in accordance with the provisions of article three, chapter twenty-nine-a of this code to ensure that a child has an effective means of being heard if he or she believes the goals of this section are not being met.

(d) When a child who was previously placed into foster care, but left the custody or guardianship of the department, is again placed into foster care, the department shall notify the foster parents who most recently cared for the child of the child's availability for foster care placement to determine if the foster parents are desirous of seeking a foster care arrangement for the child. The arrangement may only be made if the foster parents are otherwise qualified or can become qualified to enter into the foster care arrangement with the department and if the arrangement is in the best interests of the child: Provided, That the department may petition the court to waive notification to the foster parents. This waiver may be granted, ex parte, upon a showing of compelling circumstances.

PART II. HOME-BASED FAMILY PRESERVATION ACT

§ 49-2-201 Findings and purpose.

The Legislature finds that there exists a need in this state to assist dysfunctional families by providing nurture and care to those families' children as an alternative to removing children from the families.

The Legislature also finds that the family is the primary social institution responsible for meeting the needs of children and that the state has an obligation to assist families in this regard.

The Legislature further finds that children have significant emotional and social ties to the natural or surrogate family beyond basic care and nurture for which the family is responsible.

The purpose of this article is to establish a pilot program to evaluate the utility of providing intensive intervention with the families of children that are at risk of being removed from the home. For these limited purposes, the department is authorized to use available appropriate funds for that intervention service, but only to the extent that moneys would normally be available for the removal and placement of the particular child at risk.

§ 49-2-202 When family preservation services required.

Home-based family preservation services are required in all cases where the removal of a child or children is seriously being considered, whether from a natural home or a surrogate home, wherein a child or children have lived for a substantial period of time. However, those services are not required when the child appears in imminent danger of serious bodily or serious emotional injury.

§ 49-2-203 Caseload limits for home-based preservation services.

For purposes of this article, no contractor employee of the department may exceed three families during any period of time when that contractor employee is engaged in providing intensive, short term home-based family preservation intervention. In addition, no caseload may exceed six families during any period of time when home-based aftercare is provided pursuant to this article. When providing either type of home-based family preservation services to any family, the department or contractor shall provide trained personnel who shall be available during nonworking hours to assist families on an emergency basis.

§ 49-2-204 Situational criteria requiring service.

The services required by this article shall be made available to any dysfunctional family in which there exists an imminent risk of placement of at least one child outside the home as the result of abuse, neglect, dependency or delinquency or any emotional and behavioral problems. Payment for contractual services shall be on a cost-per-family basis. Any renewal of a contract shall be based on performance.

§ 49-2-205 Service delivery through service contracts; accountability.

The services required by this article which are not practically deliverable directly from the department may be subcontracted to professionally qualified private individuals, associations, agencies, corporations, partnerships or groups. The service provider shall be required to submit monthly activity reports as to any services rendered to the department of human services. The activity reports shall include project evaluation in relation to individual families being served as well as statistical data concerning families that are referred for services which are not served due to unavailability of resources. The costs of program evaluation are an allowable cost consideration in any service contract negotiated in accordance with this article. The department shall conduct a thorough investigation of the contractors utilized by the department pursuant to this article.

§ 49-2-206 Special services to be provided.

The costs of providing special services to families receiving regular services in accordance with this article are allowable to the extent those goods and services are justified pursuant to carrying out the purposes of this article. Those special services may include, but are not limited to, homemaker assistance, food, clothing, educational materials, respite care and recreational or social activities.

§ 49-2-207 Development of home-based family preservation services.

The department is authorized to use appropriate state, federal, and/or private funds within its budget for the provision of family preservation and reunification services. Appropriated state funding made available through capture of additional federal funds shall be utilized to provide family preservation and reunification services as described in this article. Costs of providing home-based services described in this article shall not exceed the costs of out-of-home care which would be incurred otherwise.

PART III. QUALITY IMPROVEMENT AND RATING SYSTEM FOR CHILD CARE.

§ 49-2-301 Findings and intent; advisory council.

(a) The Legislature finds that:

(1) High quality early childhood development substantially improves the intellectual and social potential of children and reduces societal costs;

(2) A child care program quality rating and improvement system provides incentives and resources to improve the quality child care programs; and

(3) A child care program quality rating and improvement system provides information about the quality of child care programs to parents so they may make more informed decisions about the placement of their children.

(b) It is the intent of the Legislature to require the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources promulgate a legislative rule and establish a plan for the phased implementation of a child care program quality rating and improvement system not inconsistent with the provisions of this article.

(c) The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources shall create a Quality Rating and Improvement System Advisory Council to provide advice on the development of the rule and plan for the phased implementation of a child care program quality rating and improvement system and the ongoing program review and policies for quality improvement. The secretary shall facilitate meetings of the advisory council. The advisory council shall include representatives from the provider community, advocacy groups, the Legislature, providers of professional development services for the early childhood community, regulatory agencies and others who may be impacted by the creation of a quality rating and improvement system.

(d) Nothing in this article requires an appropriation, or any specific level of appropriation, by the Legislature.

§ 49-2-302 Creation of statewide quality rating system; rule-making; minimum requirements.

(a) The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources shall propose rules for legislative approval in accordance with the provisions of article three, chapter twenty-nine-a of this code to implement a quality rating and improvement system. The quality rating and improvement system shall be applicable to licensed child care centers and facilities and registered family child care homes. If other types of child care settings, such as school-age child care programs become licensed after the implementation of a statewide quality rating and improvement system, the secretary may develop quality criteria and incentives that will allow the other types of child care settings to participate in the quality rating and improvement system. The rules shall include, but are not limited to, the following:

(1) A four-star rating system for registered family child care homes and a four-star rating system for all licensed programs, including family child care facilities and child care centers, to easily communicate to consumers four progressively higher levels of quality child care. One star indicating meeting the minimum acceptable standard and four stars indicating meeting or exceeding the highest standard. The system shall reflect the cumulative attainment of the standards at each level and all lesser levels. However, any program accredited by the National Association for the Education of Young Children or the National Association for Family Child Care, as applicable, shall automatically be awarded four-star status;

(2) Program standards for registered family child care homes and program standards for all licensed programs, including family child care facilities and child care centers, that are each divided into four levels of attributes that progressively improve the quality of child care beginning with basic state registration and licensing requirements at level one, through achievement of a national accreditation by the appropriate organization at level four. Participation beyond the first level is voluntary. The program standards shall be categorized using the West Virginia State Training and Registry System Core Knowledge Areas or its equivalent;

(3) Accountability measures that provide for a fair, valid, accurate and reliable assessment of compliance with quality standards, including, but not limited to:

(A) Evaluations conducted by trained evaluators with appropriate early childhood education and training on the selected assessment tool and with a demonstrated inter-rater reliability of eighty-five percent or higher. The evaluations shall include an on-site inspection conducted at least annually to determine whether programs are rated correctly and continue to meet the appropriate standards. The evaluations and observations shall be conducted on at least a statistically valid percentage of center classrooms, with a minimum of one class per age group;

(B) The use of valid and reliable observation and assessment tools, such as environmental rating scales for early childhood, infant and toddler, school-age care and family child care as appropriate for the particular setting and age group;

(C) An annual self-assessment using the proper observation and assessment tool for programs rated at two stars; and

(D) Model program improvement planning shall be designed to help programs improve their evaluation results and level of program quality.

(b) The rules required pursuant to this section shall include policies relating to the review, reduction, suspension or disqualification of child care programs from the quality rating and improvement system.

(c) The rules shall provide for implementation of the statewide quality rating system effective July 1, 2011, subject to section three hundred four of this article.

§ 49-2-303 Statewide quality improvement system; financial plan; staffing requirements; public awareness campaign; management information system; financial assistance for child care programs; program staff; child care consumers.

Attached to the proposed rules required in section three hundred two of this article, the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources shall submit a financial plan to support the implementation of a statewide quality rating and improvement system and help promote quality improvement. The financial plan shall be considered a part of the rule and shall include specific proposals for implementation of the provisions of this section as determined by the secretary. The plan shall address, but is not limited to, the following:

(1) State agency staffing requirements may include the following:

(A) Highly trained evaluators to monitor the assessment process and ensure inter-rater reliability of eighty-five percent or higher;

(B) Technical assistance staff responsible for career advising, accreditation support services, improvement planning, portfolio development and evaluations for improvement planning only. The goal for technical assistance staffing is to ensure that individualized technical assistance is available to participating programs;

(C) A person within the department to collaborate with other professional development providers to maximize funding for training, scholarships and professional development. The person filling this position also shall encourage community and technical colleges to provide courses through nontraditional means, such as online training, evening classes and off-campus training;

(D) Additional infant and toddler specialists to provide high level professional development for staff caring for infants and to provide on-site assistance with infant and toddler issues;

(E) At least one additional training specialist at each of the child care resource and referral agencies to support new training topics and to provide training for school-age child care programs. Training providers, such as the child care resource and referral agencies shall purchase new training programs on topics, such as business management, the Devereux Resiliency Training and Mind in the Making; and

(F) Additional staff necessary for program administration;

(2) Implementation of a broad public awareness campaign and communication strategies that may include the following:

(A) Brochures, internet sites, posters, banners, certificates, decals and pins to educate parents; and

(B) Strategies, such as earned media campaigns, paid advertising campaigns, e-mail and internet-based outreach, face-to-face communication with key civic groups and grassroots organizing techniques; and

(3) Implementation of an internet-based management information system that meets the following requirements:

(A) The system shall allow for multiple agencies to access and input data;

(B) The system shall provide the data necessary to determine if the quality enhancements result in improved care and better outcomes for children;

(C) The system shall allow access by Department of Health and Human Resources subsidy and licensing staff, child care resource and referral agencies, the agencies that provide training and scholarships, evaluators and the child care programs;

(D) The system shall include different security levels in order to comply with the numerous confidentiality requirements;

(E) The system shall assist in informing practice; determining training needs; and tracking changes in availability of care, cost of care, changes in wages and education levels; and

(F) The system shall provide accountability for child care programs and recipients and assure funds are being used effectively;

(4) Financial assistance for child care programs needed to improve learning environments, attain high ratings and sustain long-term quality without passing additional costs on to families that may include, but are not limited to:

(A) Assistance to programs in assessment and individual program improvement planning and providing the necessary information, coaching and resources to assist programs to increase their level of quality;

(B) Subsidizing participating programs for providing child care services to children of low-income families in accordance with the following:

(i) Base payment rates shall be established at the seventy-fifth percentile of market rate; and

(ii) A system of tiered reimbursement shall be established which increases the payment rates by a certain amount above the base payment rates in accordance with the rating tier of the child care program;

(C) Two types of grants shall be awarded to child care programs in accordance with the following:

(i) An incentive grant shall be awarded based on the type of child care program and the level at which the child care program is rated with the types of child care programs having more children and child care programs rated at higher tiers being awarded a larger grant than the types of child care programs having less children and child care programs rated at lower tiers; and

(ii) Grants for helping with the cost of national accreditation shall be awarded on an equitable basis.

(5) Support for increased salaries and benefits for program staff to increase educational levels essential to improving the quality of care that may include, but are not limited to:

(A) Wage supports and benefits provided as an incentive to increase child care programs ratings and as an incentive to increase staff qualifications in accordance with the following:

(i) The cost of salary supplements shall be phased in over a five-year period;

(ii) The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources shall establish a salary scale for each of the top three rating tiers that varies the salary support based on the education of the care giver and the rating tier of the program; and

(iii) Any center with at least a tier two rating that employs at least one staff person participating in the scholarship program required pursuant to paragraph (B) of this subdivision or employs degree staff may apply to the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources for funding to provide health care benefits based on the Teacher Education and Compensation Helps model in which insurance costs are shared among the employees, the employer and the state; and

(B) The provision of scholarships and establishment of professional development plans for center staff that would promote increasing the credentials of center staff over a five-year period; and

(6) Financial assistance to the child care consumers whose income is at two hundred percent of the federal poverty level or under to help them afford the increased market price of child care resulting from increased quality.

§ 49-2-304 Quality rating and improvement system pilot projects; independent third-party evaluation; modification of proposed rule and financial plan; report to Legislature; limitations on implementation.

The secretary shall report annually to the Legislature on the progress on development and implementation of a child care quality rating and improvement system and its impact on improving the quality of child care in the state. The secretary may propose amendments to the rules and financial plan necessary to promote implementation of the quality rating and improvement system and improve the quality of child care and may recommend needed legislation. Nothing in this article requires the implementation of a quality rating and improvement system unless funds are appropriated therefore. The secretary may prioritize the components of the financial plan for implementation and quality improvement for funding purposes. If insufficient funds are appropriated for full implementation of the quality rating and improvement system, the rules shall provide for gradual implementation over a period of several years.

PART VI. WEST VIRGINIA FAMILY SUPPORT PROGRAM.

§ 49-2-601 Findings; intent.

(a) The West Virginia Legislature finds that families are the greatest resource available to individuals with developmental disabilities, and they must be supported in their role as primary caregivers. It further finds that supporting families in their effort to care for their family members at home is more efficient, cost effective and humane than placing the developmentally disabled person in an institutional setting.

(b) The Legislature accepts the following as basic principles for providing services to support families of people with developmental disabilities:

(1) The quality of life of children with developmental disabilities, their families and communities is enhanced by caring for the children within their own homes. Children with disabilities benefit by growing up in their own families, families benefit by staying together and communities benefit from the inclusion of people with diverse abilities.

(2) Adults with developmental disabilities should be afforded the opportunity to make decisions for themselves, live in typical homes and communities and exercise their full rights as citizens. Developmentally disabled adults should have the option of living separately from their families but when this is not the case, families of disabled adults should be provided the support services they need.

(3) Services and support for families should be individualized and flexible, should focus on the entire family and should promote the inclusion of people with developmental disabilities in all aspects of school and community life.

(4) Families are the best experts about what they need. The service system can best assist families by supporting families as decision makers as opposed to making decisions for them.

(c) The Legislature finds that there are at least ten thousand West Virginians with developmental disabilities who live with and are supported by their families, and that the state's policy is to prevent the institutionalization of people with developmental disabilities.

(d) To maximize the number of families supported by this program, each family will contribute to the cost of goods and services based on their ability to pay, taking into account their needs and resources.

(e) Therefore, it is the intent of the Legislature to initiate, within the resources available, a program of services to support families who are caring for family members with developmental disabilities in their homes.

§ 49-2-602 Family support services; responsibilities; funds; case management; outreach; differential fees.

(a) The regional family support agency, designated under article two of this chapter, shall direct and be responsible for the individual assessment of each developmentally disabled person which it has designated and shall prepare a service plan with the developmentally disabled person's family. The needs and preferences of the family will be the basis for determining what goods and services will be made available within the resources available.

(b) The family support program may provide funds to families to purchase goods and services included in the family service plan. Those goods and services related to the care of the developmentally disabled person may include, but are not limited to:

(1) Respite care;

(2) Personal and attendant care;

(3) Child care;

(4) Architectural and vehicular modifications;

(5) Health-related costs not otherwise covered;

(6) Equipment and supplies;

(7) Specialized nutrition and clothing;

(8) Homemaker services;

(9) Transportation;

(10) Utility costs;

(11) Integrated community activities; and

(12) Training and technical assistance.

(c) As part of the family support program, the regional family support agency, designated under section six hundred two of this article, shall provide case management for each family to provide information, service coordination and other assistance as needed by the family.

(d) The family support program shall assist families of developmentally disabled adults in planning and obtaining community living arrangements, employment services and other resources needed to achieve, to the greatest extent possible, independence, productivity and integration of the developmentally disabled adult into the community.

(e) The family support program shall conduct outreach to identify families in need of assistance and shall maintain a waiting list of individuals and families in the event that there are insufficient resources to provide services to all those who request them.

(f) The family support program may provide for differential fees for services under the program or for appropriate cost participation by the recipient families consistent with the goals of the program and the overall financial condition of the family.

(g) Funds, goods or services provided to eligible families by the family support program under this article shall not be considered as income to those families for any purpose under this code or under the rules and regulations of any agency of state government.

§ 49-2-603 Eligibility; primary focus.

(a) To be eligible for the family support program, a family must have at least one family member who has a developmental disability, as defined in this article, living with the family.

(b) The primary focus of the family support program is supporting: (1) Developmentally disabled children, school age and younger, within their families; (2) adults with developmental disabilities who choose to live with their families; and (3) adults with developmental disabilities for whom other community living arrangements are not available and who are living with their families.

§ 49-2-604 Program administration; implementation; procedures; annual evaluation; coordination; plans; grievances; reports.

(a) The administering agency for the family support program is the Department of Health and Human Resources.

(b) The Department of Health and Human Resources shall initially implement the family support program through contracts with an agency within four of the state's behavioral health regions, with the four regions to be determined by the Department of Health and Human Resources in consultation with the state family support council. These regional family support agencies of the family support program will be responsible for implementing this article and subsequent policies for the families of persons with developmental disabilities residing within their respective regions.

(c) The Department of Health and Human Resources, in conjunction with the state family support council, shall adopt policies and procedures regarding:

(1) Development of annual budgets;

(2) Program specifications;

(3) Criteria for awarding contracts for operation of regional family support programs and the role of regional family support councils;

(4) Annual evaluation of services provided by each regional family support agency, including consumer satisfaction;

(5) Coordination of the family support program and the use of its funds, throughout the state and within each region, with other publicly funded programs, including Medicaid;

(6) Performance of family needs assessments and development of family service plans;

(7) Methodology for allocating resources to families within the funds available; and

(8) Resolution of grievances filed by families pertaining to actions of the family support program.

(d) The Department of Health and Human Resources shall submit a report to the Governor and the Legislature on the family support program by September 15, of every year so long as the program is funded.

§ 49-2-605 Regional and state family support councils; membership; meetings; reimbursement of expenses.

(a) Each regional family support agency shall establish a regional family support council comprised of at least seven members, of whom at least a majority shall be persons with developmental disabilities or their parents or primary caregivers. Each regional family support council shall meet at least quarterly to advise the regional family support agency on matters related to local implementation of the family support program and to communicate information and recommendations regarding the family support program to the State Family Support Council.

(b) The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources shall appoint a State Family Support Council comprised of at least twenty-two members, of whom at least a majority shall be persons with developmental disabilities or their parents or primary caregivers. A representative elected by each regional council shall serve on the state council. The state council shall also include a representative from each of the following agencies: The State Developmental Disabilities Council, the State Protection and Advocacy Agency, the Center for Excellence in Disabilities, the Office of Special Education, the Behavioral Health Care Providers Association and the Early Intervention Interagency Coordinating Council.

(c) The state council shall meet at least quarterly. The state council will participate in the development of program policies and procedures, annual contracts and perform other duties as are necessary for statewide implementation of the family support program.

(d) Members of the state and regional councils who are a member of the family or the primary caregiver of a developmentally disabled person shall be reimbursed for travel and lodging expenses incurred in attending official meetings of their councils. Child care expenses related to the developmentally disabled person shall also be reimbursed. Members of regional councils who are eligible for expense reimbursement shall be reimbursed by their respective regional family support agencies.

PART VIII. REPORTS OF CHILDREN SUSPECTED OF ABUSE.

§ 49-2-801 Purpose.

It is the purpose of this article through the complete reporting of child abuse and neglect:

(1) To protect the best interests of the child;

(2) To offer protective services in order to prevent any further harm to the child or any other children living in the home;

(3) To stabilize the home environment, to preserve family life whenever possible;

(4) To promote adult responsibility for protecting children; and

(5) To encourage cooperation among the states to prevent future incidents of child abuse and neglect and in dealing with the problems of child abuse and neglect.

§ 49-2-802 Establishment of child protective services; general duties and powers; administrative procedure; immunity from civil liability; cooperation of other state agencies.

(a) The department shall establish or designate in every county a local child protective services office to perform the duties and functions set forth in this article.

(b) The local child protective services office shall investigate all reports of child abuse or neglect. Under no circumstances may investigating personnel be relatives of the accused, the child or the families involved. In accordance with the local plan for child protective services, it shall provide protective services to prevent further abuse or neglect of children and provide for or arrange for and coordinate and monitor the provision of those services necessary to ensure the safety of children. The local child protective services office shall be organized to maximize the continuity of responsibility, care and service of individual workers for individual children and families. Under no circumstances may the secretary or his or her designee promulgate rules or establish any policy which restricts the scope or types of alleged abuse or neglect of minor children which are to be investigated or the provision of appropriate and available services.

(c) Each local child protective services office shall:

(1) Receive or arrange for the receipt of all reports of children known or suspected to be abused or neglected on a twenty-four hour, seven-day-a-week basis and cross-file all reports under the names of the children, the family and any person substantiated as being an abuser or neglecter by investigation of the Department of Health and Human Resources, with use of cross-filing of the person's name limited to the internal use of the department;

(2) Provide or arrange for emergency children's services to be available at all times;

(3) Upon notification of suspected child abuse or neglect, commence or cause to be commenced a thorough investigation of the report and the child's environment. As a part of this response, within fourteen days there shall be a face-to-face interview with the child or children and the development of a protection plan, if necessary for the safety or health of the child, which may involve law-enforcement officers or the court;

(4) Respond immediately to all allegations of imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child or of serious physical abuse. As a part of this response, within seventy-two hours there shall be a face-to-face interview with the child or children and the development of a protection plan, which may involve law-enforcement officers or the court; and

(5) In addition to any other requirements imposed by this section, when any matter regarding child custody is pending, the circuit court or family court may refer allegations of child abuse and neglect to the local child protective services office for investigation of the allegations as defined by this chapter and require the local child protective services office to submit a written report of the investigation to the referring circuit court or family court within the time frames set forth by the circuit court or family court.

(d) In those cases in which the local child protective services office determines that the best interests of the child require court action, the local child protective services office shall initiate the appropriate legal proceeding.

(e) The local child protective services office shall be responsible for providing, directing or coordinating the appropriate and timely delivery of services to any child suspected or known to be abused or neglected, including services to the child's family and those responsible for the child's care.

(f) To carry out the purposes of this article, all departments, boards, bureaus and other agencies of the state or any of its political subdivisions and all agencies providing services under the local child protective services plan shall, upon request, provide to the local child protective services office any assistance and information as will enable it to fulfill its responsibilities.

(g)(1) In order to obtain information regarding the location of a child who is the subject of an allegation of abuse or neglect, the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources may serve, by certified mail or personal service, an administrative subpoena on any corporation, partnership, business or organization for the production of information leading to determining the location of the child.

(2) In case of disobedience to the subpoena, in compelling the production of documents, the secretary may invoke the aid of:

(A) The circuit court with jurisdiction over the served party if the person served is a resident; or

(B) The circuit court of the county in which the local child protective services office conducting the investigation is located if the person served is a nonresident.

(3) A circuit court shall not enforce an administrative subpoena unless it finds that:

(A) The investigation is one the Division of Child Protective Services is authorized to make and is being conducted pursuant to a legitimate purpose;

(B) The inquiry is relevant to that purpose;

(C) The inquiry is not too broad or indefinite;

(D) The information sought is not already in the possession of the Division of Child Protective Services; and

(E) Any administrative steps required by law have been followed.

(4) If circumstances arise where the secretary, or his or her designee, determines it necessary to compel an individual to provide information regarding the location of a child who is the subject of an allegation of abuse or neglect, the secretary, or his or her designee, may seek a subpoena from the circuit court with jurisdiction over the individual from whom the information is sought.

(h) No child protective services caseworker may be held personally liable for any professional decision or action taken pursuant to that decision in the performance of his or her official duties as set forth in this section or agency rules promulgated thereupon. However, nothing in this subsection protects any child protective services worker from any liability arising from the operation of a motor vehicle or for any loss caused by gross negligence, willful and wanton misconduct or intentional misconduct.

§ 49-2-803 Persons mandated to report suspected abuse and neglect; requirements.

(a) Any medical, dental or mental health professional, Christian Science practitioner, religious healer, school teacher or other school personnel, social service worker, child care or foster care worker, emergency medical services personnel, peace officer or law-enforcement official, humane officer, member of the clergy, circuit court judge, family court judge, employee of the Division of Juvenile Services, magistrate, youth camp administrator or counselor, employee, coach or volunteer of an entity that provides organized activities for children, or commercial film or photographic print processor who has reasonable cause to suspect that a child is neglected or abused or observes the child being subjected to conditions that are likely to result in abuse or neglect shall immediately, and not more than forty-eight hours after suspecting this abuse or neglect, report the circumstances or cause a report to be made to the Department of Health and Human Resources. In any case where the reporter believes that the child suffered serious physical abuse or sexual abuse or sexual assault, the reporter shall also immediately report, or cause a report to be made, to the State Police and any law-enforcement agency having jurisdiction to investigate the complaint. Any person required to report under this article who is a member of the staff or volunteer of a public or private institution, school, entity that provides organized activities for children, facility or agency shall also immediately notify the person in charge of the institution, school, entity that provides organized activities for children, facility or agency, or a designated agent thereof, who may supplement the report or cause an additional report to be made.

(b) Any person over the age of eighteen who receives a disclosure from a credible witness or observes any sexual abuse or sexual assault of a child, shall immediately, and not more than forty-eight hours after receiving that disclosure or observing the sexual abuse or sexual assault, report the circumstances or cause a report to be made to the Department of Health and Human Resources or the State Police or other law-enforcement agency having jurisdiction to investigate the report. In the event that the individual receiving the disclosure or observing the sexual abuse or sexual assault has a good faith belief that the reporting of the event to the police would expose either the reporter, the subject child, the reporter's children or other children in the subject child's household to an increased threat of serious bodily injury, the individual may delay making the report while he or she undertakes measures to remove themselves or the affected children from the perceived threat of additional harm and the individual makes the report as soon as practicable after the threat of harm has been reduced. The law-enforcement agency that receives a report under this subsection shall report the allegations to the Department of Health and Human Resources and coordinate with any other law-enforcement agency, as necessary to investigate the report.

(c) Any school teacher or other school personnel who receives a disclosure from a witness, which a reasonable prudent person would deem credible, or personally observes any sexual contact, sexual intercourse or sexual intrusion, as those terms are defined in article eight-b, chapter sixty-one, of a child on school premises or on school buses or on transportation used in furtherance of a school purpose shall immediately, but not more than 24 hours, report the circumstances or cause a report to be made to the State Police or other law-enforcement agency having jurisdiction to investigate the report: Provided, That this subsection will not impose any reporting duty upon school teachers or other school personnel who observe, or receive a disclosure of any consensual sexual contact, intercourse, or intrusion occurring between students who would not otherwise be subject to section three, five, seven or nine of article eight-8, chapter sixty-one of this code: Provided, however, That any teacher or other school personnel shall not be in violation of this section if he or she makes known immediately, but not more than 24 hours. to the principal, assistant principal or similar person in charge, a disclosure from a witness, which a reasonable prudent person would deem credible, or personal observation of conduct described in this section: Provided further, That a principal, assistant principal or similar person in charge made aware of such disclosure or observation from a teacher or other school personnel shall be responsible for immediately, but not more than 24 hours, reporting such conduct to law enforcement.

(d) County boards of education and private school administrators shall provide all employees with a written statement setting forth the requirement contained in this subsection and shall obtain and preserve a signed acknowledgment from school employees that they have received and understand the reporting requirement.

(e) The reporting requirements contained in this section specifically include reported, disclosed or observed conduct involving or between students enrolled in a public or private institution of education, or involving a student and school teacher or personnel. When the alleged conduct is between two students or between a student and school teacher or personnel, the law enforcement body that received the report under this section is required to make such a report under this section shall additionally immediately, but not more than 24 hours, notify the students' parents, guardians, and custodians about the allegations.

(f) Nothing in this article is intended to prevent individuals from reporting suspected abuse or neglect on their own behalf. In addition to those persons and officials specifically required to report situations involving suspected abuse or neglect of children, any other person may make a report if that person has reasonable cause to suspect that a child has been abused or neglected in a home or institution or observes the child being subjected to conditions or circumstances that would reasonably result in abuse or neglect.

§ 49-2-804 Notification of disposition of reports.

The Department of Health and Human Resources shall continue to develop, update and implement a procedure to notify any person mandated to report suspected child abuse and neglect pursuant to section eight hundred three of this article, of whether an investigation into the reported suspected abuse or neglect has been initiated and when the investigation is completed.

§ 49-2-805 Educational programs; requirements.

Subject to appropriation in the budget, the department shall conduct educational and training programs for persons required to report suspected abuse or neglect, and the general public, as well as implement evidence-based programs that reduce incidents of child maltreatment including sexual abuse. Training for persons require to report and the general public shall include:

(1) Indicators of child abuse and neglect;

(2) Tactics used by sexual abusers;

(3) How and when to make a report; and

(4) Protective factors that prevent abuse and neglect in order to promote adult responsibility for protecting children, encourage maximum reporting of child abuse and neglect, and to improve communication, cooperation and coordination among all agencies involved in the identification, prevention and treatment of the abuse and neglect of children.

§ 49-2-806 Mandatory reporting of suspected animal cruelty by child protective service workers.

In the event a child protective service worker, in response to a report mandated by section eight hundred two and eight hundred three of this article, forms a reasonable suspicion that an animal is the victim of cruel or inhumane treatment, he or she shall report the suspicion and the basis therefor to the county humane officer provided under section one, article ten, chapter seven of this code within twenty-four hours of the response to the report.

§ 49-2-807 Mandatory reporting to medical examiner or coroner; postmortem investigation.

Any person or official who is required pursuant to section eight hundred three of this article to report cases of suspected child abuse or neglect and who has reasonable cause to suspect that a child has died as a result of child abuse or neglect, shall report that fact to the appropriate medical examiner or coroner. Upon the receipt of that report, the medical examiner or coroner shall cause an investigation to be made and report his or her findings to the police, the appropriate prosecuting attorney, the local child protective service agency and, if the institution making a report is a hospital, to the hospital.

§ 49-2-808 Photographs and X rays.

Any person required to report cases of children suspected of being abused and neglected may take or cause to be taken, at public expense, photographs of the areas of trauma visible on a child and, if medically indicated, cause to be performed radiological examinations of the child. Any photographs or X rays taken shall be sent to the appropriate child protective service as soon as possible.

§ 49-2-809 Reporting procedures.

(a) Reports of child abuse and neglect pursuant to this article shall be made immediately by telephone to the local department child protective service agency and shall be followed by a written report within forty-eight hours if so requested by the receiving agency. The state department shall establish and maintain a twenty-four hour, seven-day-a-week telephone number to receive those calls reporting suspected or known child abuse or neglect.

(b) A copy of any report of serious physical abuse, sexual abuse or assault shall be forwarded by the department to the appropriate law-enforcement agency, the prosecuting attorney or the coroner or medical examiner's office. All reports under this article are confidential. Reports of known or suspected institutional child abuse or neglect shall be made and received as all other reports made pursuant to this article.

§ 49-2-810 Immunity from liability.

Any person, official or institution participating in good faith in any act permitted or required by this article are immune from any civil or criminal liability that otherwise might result by reason of those actions.

§ 49-2-811 Abrogation of privileged communications; exception.

The privileged quality of communications between husband and wife and between any professional person and his or her patient or his or her client, except that between attorney and client, is hereby abrogated in situations involving suspected or known child abuse or neglect.

§ 49-2-812 Failure to report; penalty.

(a) Any person, official or institution required by this article to report a case involving a child known or suspected to be abused or neglected, or required by section eight hundred nine of this article to forward a copy of a report of serious injury, who knowingly fails to do so or knowingly prevents another person acting reasonably from doing so, is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be confined in jail not more than ninety days or fined not more than $5,000, or both fined and confined.

(b) Any person, official or institution required by this article to report a case involving a child known or suspected to be sexually assaulted or sexually abused, or student known or suspected to have been a victim of any non-consensual sexual contact, sexual intercourse or sexual intrusion on school premises, who knowingly fails to do so or knowingly prevents another person acting reasonably from doing so, is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be confined in jail not more than six months or fined not more than $10,000, or both.

§ 49-2-813 Statistical index; reports.

The Department of Health and Human Resources shall maintain a statewide child abuse and neglect statistical index of all substantiated allegations of child abuse or neglect cases to include information contained in the reports required under this article and any other information considered appropriate by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources. Nothing in the statistical data index maintained by the Department of Health and Human Resources may contain information of a specific nature that would identify individual cases or persons. Notwithstanding section two hundred one, article four of this chapter, the Department of Health and Human Resources shall provide copies of the statistical data maintained pursuant to this subsection to the State Police child abuse and neglect investigations unit to carry out its responsibilities to protect children from abuse and neglect.

§ 49-2-814. Task Force on Prevention of Sexual Abuse of Children.

(a) This section may be referred to as "Erin Merryn's Law".

(b) The Task Force on Prevention of Sexual Abuse of Children is established. The task force consists of the following members:

(1) The Chair of the West Virginia Senate Committee on Health and Human Resources, or his or her designee;

(2) The Chair of the House of Delegates Committee on Health and Human Resources, or his or her designee;

(3) The Chair of the West Virginia Senate Committee on Education, or his or her designee;

(4) The Chair of the House of Delegates Committee on Education, or his or her designee;

(5) One citizen member appointed by the President of the Senate;

(6) One citizen member appointed by the Speaker of the House of Delegates;

(7) One citizen member, who is a survivor of child sexual abuse, appointed by the Governor;

(8) The President of the State Board of Education, or his or her designee;

(9) The State Superintendent of Schools, or his or her designee;

(10) The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Resources, or his or her designee;

(11) The Director of the Prosecuting Attorney's Institute, or his or her designee;

(12) One representative of each statewide professional teachers' organization, each selected by the leader of his or her respective organization;

(13) One representative of the statewide school service personnel organization, selected by the leader of the organization;

(14) One representative of the statewide school principals' organization, appointed by the leader of the organization;

(15) One representative of the statewide professional social workers' organization, appointed by the leader of the organization;

(16) One representative of a teacher preparation program of a regionally accredited institution of higher education in the state, appointed by the Chancellor of the Higher Education Policy Commission;

(17) The Chief Executive Officer of the Center for Professional Development, or his or her designee;

(18) The Director of Prevent Child Abuse West Virginia, or his or her designee;

(19) The Director of the West Virginia Child Advocacy Network, or his or her designee;

(20) The Director of the West Virginia Coalition Against Domestic Violence, or his or her designee;

(21) The Director of the West Virginia Foundation for Rape Information and Services, or his or her designee;

(22) The Administrative Director of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals, or his or her designee;

(23) The Executive Director of the West Virginia Sheriffs' Association, or his or her designee;

(24) One representative of an organization representing law enforcement, appointed by the Superintendent of the West Virginia State Police; and

(25) One practicing school counselor appointed by the leader of the West Virginia School Counselors Association.

(c) To the extent practicable, members of the task force shall be individuals actively involved in the fields of child abuse and neglect prevention and child welfare.

(d) At the joint call of the House of Delegates and Senate Education Committee Chairs, the task force shall convene its first meeting and by majority vote of members present elect presiding officers. Subsequent meetings shall be at the call of the presiding officer.

(e) The task force shall make recommendations for decreasing incidence of sexual abuse of children in West Virginia. In making those recommendations, the task force shall:

(1) Gather information regarding sexual abuse of children throughout the state;

(2) Receive related reports and testimony from individuals, state and local agencies, community-based organizations, and other public and private organizations;

(3) Create goals for state education policy that would prevent sexual abuse of children;

(4) Create goals for other areas of state policy that would prevent sexual abuse of children; and

(5) Submit a report with its recommendations to the Governor and the Legislature.

(f) The recommendations may include proposals for specific statutory changes and methods to foster cooperation among state agencies and between the state and local governments. The task force shall consult with employees of the Bureau for Children and Family Services, the Division of Justice and Community Services, the West Virginia State Police, the State Board of Education, and any other state agency or department as necessary to accomplish its responsibilities under this section.

(g) Task force members serve without compensation and do not receive expense reimbursement.

ARTICLE 3. SPECIALIZED ADVOCACY PROGRAMS.

§ 49-3-101 Child advocacy centers; services; requirements.

Child advocacy centers provide the following services to children in the child welfare program in West Virginia:

(1) Operation of a child-appropriate or child-friendly facility that provides a comfortable, private setting that is both physically and psychologically safe for clients.

(2) Participation in a multidisciplinary team for response to child abuse allegations.

(3) Operate a legal entity responsible for program and fiscal operations that has established and implemented basic sound administrative practices.

(4) Promote policies, practices and procedures that are culturally competent and diverse. Cultural competency is defined as the capacity to function in more than one culture, requiring the ability to appreciate, understand and interact with members of diverse populations within the local community.

(5) Conduct forensic interviews in a manner which is of a neutral, fact-finding nature and coordinated to avoid duplicative interviewing.

(6) Provide specialized medical evaluation and treatment made available to clients as part of the team response, either at the CAC or through coordination and referral with other specialized medical providers.

(7) Offer therapeutic intervention through specialized mental health services made available as part of the team response, either at the child advocacy center or through coordination and referral with other appropriate treatment providers.

(8) Victim support and advocacy as part of the team response, either at the child advocacy center or through coordination with other providers, throughout the investigation and subsequent legal proceedings.

(9) Conducting team discussions and providing information sharing regarding the investigation, case status and services needed by the child and family are to occur on a routine basis.

(10) Developing and implementing a system for monitoring case progress and tracking case outcomes for team components.

(11) May establish a safe exchange location for children and families who have a parenting agreement or an order providing for visitation or custody of the children that require a safe exchange location.

§ 49-3-102 Court appointed special advocate; operations.

A court appointed special advocate (CASA) shall operate as follows:

(1) Standards: CASA programs shall be members in good standing with the West Virginia Court Appointed Special Advocate Association, Inc., and the National Court Appointed Special Advocates Association and adhere to all standards set forth by these entities.

(2) Organizational capacity: A designated legal entity is responsible for program and fiscal operations has been established and implements basic sound administrative practice.

(3) Cultural competency and diversity: CASA programs shall promote policies, practices and procedures that are culturally competent. "Cultural competency" is defined as the capacity to function in more than one culture, requiring the ability to appreciate, understand and interact with members of diverse populations within the local community.

(4) Case management: CASA programs must utilize a uniform case management system to monitor case progress and track outcomes.

(5) Case review: CASA volunteers shall meet with CASA staff on a routine basis to discuss case status and outcomes.

(6) Training: Court appointed special advocates shall serve as volunteers without compensation and shall receive training consistent with state and nationally developed standards.

ARTICLE 4. COURT ACTIONS.

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS.

§ 49-4-101 Exercise of powers and jurisdiction by judge in vacation.

The powers and jurisdiction of the court, under the provisions of this chapter, may be exercised by the judge in vacation.

§ 49-4-102 Procedure for appealing decisions.

Cases under this chapter, if tried in any inferior court, may be reviewed by writ of error or appeal to the circuit court, and if tried or reviewed in a circuit court, by writ of error or appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeals.

§ 49-4-103 Proceedings may not be evidence against child, or be published; adjudication is not a conviction and not a bar to civil service eligibility.

Any evidence given in any cause or proceeding under this chapter, or any order, judgment or finding therein, or any adjudication upon the status of juvenile delinquent heretofore made or rendered, may not in any civil, criminal or other cause or proceeding whatever in any court, be lawful or proper evidence against the child for any purpose whatsoever except in subsequent cases under this chapter involving the same child; nor may the name of any child, in connection with any proceedings under this chapter, be published in any newspaper without a written order of the court; nor may any adjudication upon the status of any child by a juvenile court operate to impose any of the civil disabilities ordinarily imposed by conviction, nor may any child be deemed a criminal by reason of the adjudication, nor may the adjudication be deemed a conviction, nor may any adjudication operate to disqualify a child in any future civil service examination, appointment, or application.

§ 49-4-104 General provisions relating to court orders regarding custody; rules.

(a) The Supreme Court of Appeals, in consultation with the Department of Health and Human Resources and the Division of Juvenile Services in order to eliminate unnecessary state funding of out-of-home placements where federal funding is available, shall develop and disseminate form court orders to effectuate chapter forty-nine of this code which authorize disclosure and transfer of juvenile records between agencies while requiring maintenance of confidentiality, Child Welfare Services, 42 U.S.C. § 620, et seq., and 42 U.S.C. § 670, et seq., relating to the promulgation of uniform court orders for placement of minor children and the rules promulgated thereunder, for use in the courts of the state.

(b) Judges and magistrates, upon being supplied the form orders required by subsection (a) of this section, shall act to ensure the proper form order is entered in the case so as to allow federal funding of eligible out-of-home placements.

§ 49-4-105 Hearing required to determine "reasonable efforts."

A hearing by a circuit court of competent jurisdiction is required to determine whether or not "reasonable efforts" have been made to stabilize and maintain the family situation before any child may be placed outside the home, except that in the event any child appears in imminent danger of serious bodily or emotional injury or death in any home, a post-removal hearing shall be substituted for the pre-removal hearing.

§ 49-4-106 Limitation on out-of-home placements.

Before any child may be directed for placement in a particular facility or for services of a child welfare agency licensed by the department, a court shall make inquiry into the bed space of the facility available to accommodate additional children and the ability of the child welfare agency to meet the particular needs of the child. A court may not order the placement of a child in a particular facility, including status offender facilities operated by the Division of Juvenile Services, if it has reached its licensed capacity or order conditions on the placement of the child which conflict with licensure regulations applicable to the facility promulgated pursuant to article two of this chapter and articles one-a, nine and seventeen, chapter twenty-seven of this code. Further, a child welfare agency is not required to accept placement of a child at a particular facility if the facility remains at licensed capacity or is unable to meet the particular needs of the child. A child welfare agency is not required to make special dispensation or accommodation, reorganize existing child placement, or initiate early release of children in placement to reduce actual occupancy at the facility.

§ 49-4-107 Penalties.

A person who violates an order, rule, or regulation made under the authority of this chapter, or who violates this chapter for which punishment has not been specifically provided, is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction shall be fined not less than $10 nor more than $100, or confined in jail not less than five days nor more than six months, or both fined and confined.

§ 49-4-108 Payment of services.

At any time during any proceedings brought pursuant to this article, the court may upon its own motion, or upon a motion of any party, order the Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services rendered by a psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional to a child or other party to the proceedings. Professional services include, but are not limited to, treatment, therapy, counseling, evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony. The Department of Health and Human Resources shall set the fee schedule for the services in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate and adjust the schedule as appropriate. Every psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional shall be paid by the Department of Health and Human Resources upon completion of services and submission of a final report or other information and documentation as required by the policies and procedures implemented by the Department of Health and Human Resources.

§ 49-4-109 Guardianship of estate of child unaffected.

This chapter may not be construed to give the guardian appointed hereunder the guardianship of the estate of the child, or to change the age of minority for any other purpose except the custody of the child.

The guardian of the estate of a child committed to guardianship hereunder shall furnish, when and in the form as may be required, full information concerning the property of the child to the state department or to the court or judge before whom the case of the child is heard.

§ 49-4-110 Foster care; quarterly status review; transitioning adults; annual permanency hearings.

(a) For each child who remains in foster care as a result of a juvenile proceeding or as a result of a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the circuit court with the assistance of the multidisciplinary treatment team shall conduct quarterly status reviews in order to determine the safety of the child, the continuing necessity for and appropriateness of the placement, the extent of compliance with the case plan, and the extent of progress which has been made toward alleviating or mitigating the causes necessitating placement in foster care, and to project a likely date by which the child may be returned to and safety maintained in the home or placed for adoption or legal guardianship. Quarterly status reviews shall commence three months after the entry of the placement order. The permanency hearing provided in subsection (c) of this section may be considered a quarterly status review.

(b) For each transitioning adult as that term is defined in section two hundred two, article one of this chapter who remains in foster care, the circuit court shall conduct status review hearings as described in subsection (a) of this section once every three months until permanency is achieved.

(c) For each child or transitioning adult who continues to remain in foster care, the circuit court shall conduct a permanency hearing no later that twelve months after the date the child or transitioning adult is considered to have entered foster care, and at least once every twelve months thereafter until permanency is achieved. For purposes of permanency planning for transitioning adults, the circuit court shall make factual findings and conclusions of law as to whether the department made reasonable efforts to finalize a permanency plan to prepare a transitioning adult for emancipation or independence or another approved permanency option such as, but not limited to, adoption or legal guardianship pursuant to the West Virginia Guardianship and Conservatorship Act.

(d) Nothing in this section may be construed to abrogate the responsibilities of the circuit court from conducting required hearings as provided in other provisions of this code, procedural court rules, or setting required hearings at the same time.

§ 49-4-111 Criteria and procedure for temporary removal of child from foster home; foster care arrangement termination; notice of child's availability for placement; adoption; sibling placements; limitations.

(a) The department may temporarily remove a child from a foster home based on an allegation of abuse or neglect, including sexual abuse, that occurred while the child resided in the home. If the department determines that reasonable cause exists to support the allegation, the department shall remove all foster children from the arrangement, preclude contact between the children and the foster parents, provide written notice to the multidiscplinary treatment team members and schedule an emergency team meeting to address placement options. If, after investigation, the allegation is determined to be true by the department or after a judicial proceeding a court finds the allegation to be true or if the foster parents fail to contest the allegation in writing within twenty calendar days of receiving written notice of the allegations, the department shall permanently terminate all foster care arrangements with the foster parents. If the department determines that the abuse occurred due to no act or failure to act on the part of the foster parents and that continuation of the foster care arrangement is in the best interests of the child, the department may, in its discretion, elect not to terminate the foster care arrangement or arrangements.

(b) When a child has been placed in a foster care arrangement for a period in excess of eighteen consecutive months, and the department determines that the placement is a fit and proper place for the child to reside, the foster care arrangement may not be terminated unless the termination is in the best interest of the child and:

(1) The foster care arrangement is terminated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section;

(2) The foster care arrangement is terminated due to the child being returned to his or her parent or parents;

(3) The foster care arrangement is terminated due to the child being united or reunited with a sibling or siblings;

(4) The foster parent or parents agree to the termination in writing;

(5) The foster care arrangement is terminated at the written request of a foster child who has attained the age of fourteen; or

(6) A court orders the termination upon a finding that the department has developed a more suitable long-term placement for the child upon hearing evidence in a proceeding brought by the department seeking removal and transfer.

(c) When a child has been residing in a foster home for a period in excess of six consecutive months in total and for a period in excess of thirty days after the parental rights of the child's biological parents have been terminated and the foster parents have not made an application to the department to establish an intent to adopt the child within thirty days of parental rights being terminated, the department may terminate the foster care arrangement if another, more beneficial, long-term placement of the child is developed. If the child is twelve years of age or older, the child shall be provided the option of remaining in the existing foster care arrangement if the child so desires and if continuation of the existing arrangement is in the best interest of the child.

(d)(1) When a child is placed into foster care or becomes eligible for adoption and a sibling or siblings have previously been placed in foster care or have been adopted, the department shall notify the foster parents or adoptive parents of the previously placed or adopted sibling or siblings of the child's availability for foster care placement or adoption to determine if the foster parents or adoptive parents are desirous of seeking a foster care arrangement or adoption of the child.

(2) Where a sibling or siblings have previously been adopted, the department shall also notify the adoptive parents of a sibling of the child's availability for foster care placement in that home and a foster care arrangement entered into to place the child in the home if the adoptive parents of the sibling are otherwise qualified or can become qualified to enter into a foster care arrangement with the department and if the arrangement is in the best interests of the child.

(3) The department may petition the court to waive notification to the foster parents or adoptive parents of the child's siblings. This waiver may be granted, ex parte, upon a showing of compelling circumstances.

(e)(1) When a child is in a foster care arrangement and is residing separately from a sibling or siblings who are in another foster home or who have been adopted by another family and the parents with whom the placed or adopted sibling or siblings reside have made application to the department to establish an intent to adopt or to enter into a foster care arrangement regarding a child so that the child may be united or reunited with a sibling or siblings, the department shall, upon a determination of the fitness of the persons and household seeking to enter into a foster care arrangement or seek an adoption which would unite or reunite siblings, and if termination and new placement are in the best interests of the children, terminate the foster care arrangement and place the child in the household with the sibling or siblings.

(2) If the department is of the opinion based upon available evidence that residing in the same home would have a harmful physical, mental or psychological effect on one or more of the sibling children or if the child has a physical or mental disability which the existing foster home can better accommodate, or if the department can document that the reunification of the siblings would not be in the best interest of one or all of the children, the department may petition the circuit court for an order allowing the separation of the siblings to continue.

(3) If the child is twelve years of age or older, the department shall provide the child the option of remaining in the existing foster care arrangement if remaining is in the best interests of the child. In any proceeding brought by the department to maintain separation of siblings, the separation may be ordered only if the court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the department's determination.

(4) In any proceeding brought by the department seeking to maintain separation of siblings, notice afforded, in addition to any other persons required by any provision of this code to receive notice, to the persons seeking to adopt a sibling or siblings of a previously placed or adopted child and the persons may be parties to the action.

(f) Where two or more siblings have been placed in separate foster care arrangements and the foster parents of the siblings have made application to the department to enter into a foster care arrangement regarding the sibling or siblings not in their home or where two or more adoptive parents seek to adopt a sibling or siblings of a child they have previously adopted, the department's determination as to placing the child in a foster care arrangement or in an adoptive home shall be based solely upon the best interests of the siblings.

§ 49-4-112 Subsidized adoption and legal guardianship; conditions.

(a) From funds appropriated to the Department of Health and Human Resources, the secretary shall establish a system of assistance for facilitating the adoption or legal guardianship of children. An adoption subsidy shall be available for children who are legally free for adoption and who are dependents of the department or a child welfare agency licensed to place children for adoption. A legal guardianship subsidy may not require the surrender or termination of parental rights. For either subsidy, the children must be in special circumstances because one or more of the following conditions inhibit their adoption or legal guardianship placement:

(1) They have a physical or mental disability;

(2) They are emotionally disturbed;

(3) They are older children;

(4) They are a part of a sibling group; or

(5) They are a member of a racial or ethnic minority.

(b)(1) The department shall provide assistance in the form of subsidies or other services to parents who are found and approved for adoption or legal guardianship of a child certified as eligible for subsidy by the department, but before the final decree of adoption or order of legal guardianship is entered, there must be a written agreement between the family entering into the subsidized adoption or legal guardianship and the department.

(2) Adoption or legal guardianship subsidies in individual cases may commence with the adoption or legal guardianship placement, and will vary with the needs of the child as well as the availability of other resources to meet the child's needs. The subsidy may be for special services only, or for money payments, and either for a limited period, or for a long term, or for any combination of the foregoing.

(3) The specific financial terms of the subsidy shall be included in the agreement between the department and the adoptive parents or legal guardians. The agreement may recognize and provide for direct payment by the department of attorney's fees to an attorney representing the adoptive parent.

(4) The amount of the time-limited or long-term subsidy may in no case exceed that which would be allowable from time to time for the child under foster family care or, in the case of a special service, the reasonable fee for the service rendered.

(5) In addition, the department shall provide either Medicaid or other health insurance coverage for any special needs child for whom there is an adoption or legal guardianship assistance agreement between the department and the adoptive parent or legal guardian and who the department determines cannot be placed with an adoptive parent or legal guardian without medical assistance because the child has special needs for medical, mental health or rehabilitative care.

(c) After reasonable efforts have been made without the use of subsidy and no appropriate adoptive family or legal guardian has been found for the child, the department shall certify the child as eligible for a subsidy in the event of adoption or a legal guardianship. Reasonable efforts to place a child without a subsidy shall not be required if it is in the best interest of the child because of the factors as the existence of significant emotional ties developed between the child and the prospective parent or guardian while in care as a foster child.

(d) If the child is the dependent of a voluntary licensed child-placing agency, that agency shall present to the department evidence of the inability to place the child for adoption or legal guardianship without the use of subsidy or evidence that the efforts would not be in the best interests of the child. In no event may the value of the services and assistance provided by the department under an agreement pursuant to this section exceed the value of assistance available to foster families in similar circumstances. All records regarding subsidized adoptions or legal guardianships are to be held in confidence; however, records regarding the payment of public funds for subsidized adoptions or legal guardianships shall be available for public inspection provided they do not directly or indirectly identify any child or persons receiving funds for the child.

§ 49-4-113 Duration of custody or guardianship of children committed to department.

(a) A child committed to the department for guardianship, after termination of parental rights, shall remain in the care of the department until he or she attains the age of eighteen years, or is married, or is adopted, or guardianship is relinquished through the court.

(b) A child committed to the department for custody shall remain in the care of the department until he or she attains the age of eighteen years, or until he or she is discharged because he or she is no longer in need of care.

§ 49-4-114 Consent by agency or department to adoption of child; statement of relinquishment by parent; counseling services; petition to terminate parental rights; notice; hearing; court orders.

(a)(1) Whenever a child welfare agency licensed to place children for adoption or the Department of Health and Human Resources has been given the permanent legal and physical custody of any child and the rights of the mother and the rights of the legal, determined, putative, outside or unknown father of the child have been terminated by order of a court of competent jurisdiction or by a legally executed relinquishment of parental rights, the child welfare agency or the department may consent to the adoption of the child pursuant to article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight of this code.

(2) Relinquishment for an adoption to an agency or to the department is required of the same persons whose consent or relinquishment is required under section three hundred one, article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight of this code. The form of any relinquishment so required shall conform as nearly as practicable to the requirements established in section three hundred three, article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight, and all other provisions of that article providing for relinquishment for adoption shall govern the proceedings herein.

(3) For purposes of any placement of a child for adoption by the department, the department shall first consider the suitability and willingness of any known grandparent or grandparents to adopt the child. Once grandparents who are interested in adopting the child have been identified, the department shall conduct a home study evaluation, including home visits and individual interviews by a licensed social worker. If the department determines, based on the home study evaluation, that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents, it shall assure that the grandparents are offered the placement of the child prior to the consideration of any other prospective adoptive parents.

(4) The department shall make available, upon request, for purposes of any private or agency adoption proceeding, preplacement and post-placement counseling services by persons experienced in adoption counseling, at no cost, to any person whose consent or relinquishment is required pursuant to article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight of this code.

(b)(1) Whenever the mother has executed a relinquishment pursuant to this section, and the legal, determined, putative, outsider or unknown father, as those terms are defined pursuant to part one, article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight of this code, has not executed a relinquishment, the child welfare agency or the department may, by verified petition, seek to have the father's rights terminated based upon the grounds of abandonment or neglect of the child. Abandonment may be established in accordance with section three hundred six, article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight of this code.

(2) Unless waived by a writing acknowledged as in the case of deeds or by other proper means, notice of the petition shall be served on any person entitled to parental rights of a child prior to its adoption who has not signed a relinquishment of custody of the child.

(3) In addition, notice shall be given to any putative, outsider or unknown father who has asserted or exercised parental rights and duties to and with the child and who has not relinquished any parental rights and the rights have not otherwise been terminated, or who has not had reasonable opportunity before or after the birth of the child to assert or exercise those rights, except that if the child is more than six months old at the time the notice would be required and the father has not asserted or exercised his or her parental rights and he or she knew the whereabouts of the child, then the father shall be presumed to have had reasonable opportunity to assert or exercise any rights.

(c)(1) Upon the filing of the verified petition seeking to have the parental rights terminated, the court shall set a hearing on the petition. A copy of the petition and notice of the date, time and place of the hearing on the petition shall be personally served on any respondent at least twenty days prior to the date set for the hearing.

(2) The notice shall inform the person that his or her parental rights, if any, may be terminated in the proceeding and that the person may appear and defend any rights within twenty days of the service. In the case of a person who is a nonresident or whose whereabouts are unknown, service shall be achieved: (1) By personal service; (2) by registered or certified mail, return receipt requested, postage prepaid, to the person's last known address, with instructions to forward; or (3) by publication. If personal service is not acquired, then if the person giving notice has any knowledge of the whereabouts of the person to be served, including a last known address, service by mail shall be first attempted as herein provided. Service achieved by mail shall be complete upon mailing and is sufficient service without the need for notice by publication. In the event that no return receipt is received giving adequate evidence of receipt of the notice by the addressee or of receipt of the notice at the address to which the notice was mailed or forwarded, or if the whereabouts of the person are unknown, then the person required to give notice shall file with the court an affidavit setting forth the circumstances of any attempt to serve the notice by mail, and the diligent efforts to ascertain the whereabouts of the person to be served. If the court determines that the whereabouts of the person to be served cannot be ascertained and that due diligence has been exercised to ascertain the person's whereabouts, then the court shall order service of the notice by publication as a Class II publication in compliance with article three, chapter fifty-nine of this code, and the publication area shall be the county where the proceedings are had, and in the county where the person to be served was last known to reside. In the case of a person under disability, service shall be made on the person and his or her personal representative, or if there be none, on a guardian ad litem.

(3) In the case of service by publication or mail or service on a personal representative or a guardian ad litem, the person is allowed thirty days from the date of the first publication or mailing of the service on a personal representative or guardian ad litem in which to appear and defend the parental rights.

(d) A petition under this section may be instituted in the county where the child resides or where the child is living.

(e) If the court finds that the person certified to parental rights is guilty of the allegations set forth in the petition, the court shall enter an order terminating his or her parental rights and shall award the legal and physical custody and control of the child to the petitioner.

§ 49-4-115 Emancipation.

(a) A child over the age of sixteen may petition a court to be declared emancipated. The parents or custodians shall be made respondents and, in addition to personal service thereon, there shall be publication as a Class II legal advertisement in compliance with article three, chapter fifty-nine of this code.

(b) Upon a showing that the child can provide for his or her physical and financial well-being and has the ability to make decisions for himself or herself, the court may for good cause shown declare the child emancipated. The child shall thereafter have full capacity to contract in his or her own right and the parents or custodians have no right to the custody and control of the child or duty to provide the child with care and financial support.

(c) A child over the age of sixteen years who marries is emancipated by operation of law. An emancipated child has all of the privileges, rights and duties of an adult, including the right of contract, except that the child remains a child as defined for the purposes of part ten, article two, or part seven, article four of this chapter.

§ 49-4-116 Voluntary placement; petition; requirements; attorney appointed; court hearing; orders.

(a) Within ninety days of the date of the signatures to a voluntary placement agreement, after receipt of physical custody, the department shall file with the court a petition for review of the placement. The petition shall include:

(1) A statement regarding the child's situation; and,

(2) The circumstance that gives rise to the voluntary placement.

(b) If the department intends to extend the voluntary placement agreement, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan.

(c) The court shall appoint an attorney for the child, who shall receive a copy of the case plan as provided in subsection (b) of this section.

(d) The court shall schedule a hearing and give notice of the time and place and right to be present at the hearing to:

(1) The child's attorney;

(2) The child, if twelve years of age or older;

(3) The child's parents or guardians;

(4) The child's foster parents;

(5) Any preadoptive parent or relative providing care for the child; and

(6) Any other persons as the court may in its discretion direct.

The child's presence at the hearing may be waived by the child's attorney at the request of the child or if the child would suffer emotional harm.

(e) At the conclusion of the proceedings, but no later than ninety days after the date of the signatures to the voluntary placement agreement, the court shall enter an order:

(1) Determining whether or not continuation of the voluntary placement is in the best interests of the child;

(2) Specifying under what conditions the child's placement will continue;

(3) Specifying whether or not the department is required to and has made reasonable efforts to preserve and to reunify the family; and

(4) Providing a plan for the permanent placement of the child.

PART II. EMERGENCY POSSESSION OF CERTAIN RELINQUISHED CHILDREN.

§ 49-4-201 Accepting possession of certain relinquished children.

(a) A hospital or health care facility operating in this state, shall, without a court order, take possession of a child if the child is voluntarily delivered to the hospital or health care facility by the child's parent within thirty days of the child's birth, and the parent did not express an intent to return for the child.

(b) A hospital or health care facility that takes possession of a child under this article shall perform any act necessary to protect the physical health or safety of the child. In accepting possession of the child, the hospital or health care facility may not require the person to identify himself or herself and shall otherwise respect the person's desire to remain anonymous.

§ 49-4-202 Notification of possession of relinquished child; department responsibilities.

(a) Not later than the close of the first business day after the date on which a hospital or health care facility takes possession of a child pursuant to section two hundred one of this article, the hospital or health care facility shall notify the Child Protective Services division of the Department of Health and Human Resources that it has taken possession of the child and shall provide the division any information provided by the parent delivering the child. The hospital or health care facility shall refer any inquiries about the child to the Child Protective Services division.

(b) The Department of Health and Human Resources shall assume the care, control and custody of the child as of the time of delivery of the child to the hospital or health care facility, and may contract with private child care agency for the care and placement of the child after the child leaves the hospital or health care facility.

§ 49-4-203 Filing petition after accepting possession of relinquished child.

A child of whom the Department of Health and Human Resources assumes care, control and custody under this article is a relinquished child and to be treated in all respects as a child taken into custody pursuant to section three hundred three, article four of this chapter. Upon taking custody of a child under this article, the department, with the cooperation of the county prosecuting attorney, shall cause a petition to be presented pursuant to section six hundred two, article four of this chapter. The department and county prosecuting attorney may not identify in the petition the parent(s) who utilized this article to relinquish his or her child. Thereafter, the department shall proceed in compliance with part six, of this article.

§ 49-4-204 Immunity from certain prosecutions.

A parent who relinquishes his or her child in good faith within thirty days of the child's birth under this article is immune from prosecution under subsection (a), section four, article eight-d, chapter sixty-one of this code.

§ 49-4-205 Adoption eligibility.

The child is eligible for adoption as an abandoned child under chapter forty-eight of the code.

PART III. EMERGENCY CUSTODY OF CHILDREN PRIOR TO PETITION.

§ 49-4-301 Custody of a neglected child by law enforcement in emergency situations; protective custody; requirements; notices; petition for appointment of special guardian; discharge; immunity.

(a) A child believed to be a neglected child or an abused child may be taken into custody without the court order otherwise required by section six hundred two of this article by a law-enforcement officer if:

(1) The child is without supervision or shelter for an unreasonable period of time in light of the child's age and the ability to care for himself or herself in circumstances presenting an immediate threat of serious harm to that child; or

(2) That officer determines that the child is in a condition requiring emergency medical treatment by a physician and the child's parents, parent, guardian or custodian refuses to permit the treatment, or is unavailable for consent. A child who suffers from a condition requiring emergency medical treatment, whose parents, parent, guardian or custodian refuses to permit the providing of the emergency medical treatment, may be retained in a hospital by a physician against the will of the parents, parent, guardian or custodian, as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

(b) A child taken into protective custody pursuant to subsection (a) of this section may be housed by the department or in any authorized child shelter facility. The authority to hold the child in protective custody, absent a petition and proper order granting temporary custody pursuant to section six hundred two of this article, terminates by operation of law upon the happening of either of the following events, whichever occurs first:

(1) The expiration of ninety-six hours from the time the child is initially taken into protective custody; or

(2) The expiration of the circumstances which initially warranted the determination of an emergency situation.

No child may be considered in an emergency situation and custody withheld from the child's parents, parent, guardian or custodian presenting themselves, himself or herself in a fit and proper condition and requesting physical custody of the child. No child may be removed from a place of residence as in an emergency under this section until after:

(1) All reasonable efforts to make inquiries and arrangements with neighbors, relatives and friends have been exhausted; or if no arrangements can be made; and

(2) The state department may place in the residence a home services worker with the child for a period of not less than twelve hours to await the return of the child's parents, parent, guardian or custodian.

Prior to taking a child into protective custody as abandoned at a place at or near the residence of the child, the law-enforcement officer shall post a typed or legibly handwritten notice at the place the child is found, informing the parents, parent, guardian or custodian that the child was taken by a law-enforcement officer, the name, address and office telephone number of the officer, the place and telephone number where information can continuously be obtained as to the child's whereabouts, and if known, the worker for the state department having responsibility for the child.

(c) A child taken into protective custody pursuant to this section for emergency medical treatment may be held in a hospital under the care of a physician against the will of the child's parents, parent, guardian or custodian for a period not to exceed ninety-six hours. The parents, parent, guardian or custodian may not be denied the right to see or visit with the child in a hospital. The authority to retain a child in protective custody in a hospital as requiring emergency medical treatment terminates by operation of law upon the happening of either of the following events, whichever occurs first:

(1) When the condition, in the opinion of the physician, no longer required emergency hospitalization, or;

(2) Upon the expiration of ninety-six hours from the initiation of custody, unless within that time, a petition is presented and a proper order obtained from the circuit court.

(d) Prior to assuming custody of a child from a law-enforcement officer, pursuant to this section, a physician or worker from the department shall require a typed or legibly handwritten statement from the officer identifying the officer's name, address and office telephone number and specifying all the facts upon which the decision to take the child into protective custody was based, and the date, time and place of the taking.

(e) Any worker for the department assuming custody of a child pursuant to this section shall immediately notify the parents, parent, guardian or custodian of the child of the taking of the custody and the reasons therefor, if the whereabouts of the parents, parent, guardian or custodian are known or can be discovered with due diligence; and if not, notice and explanation shall be given to the child's closest relative, if his or her whereabouts are known or can be discovered with due diligence within a reasonable time. An inquiry shall be made of relatives and neighbors, and if a relative or appropriate neighbor is willing to assume custody of the child, the child will temporarily be placed in custody.

(f) No child may be taken into custody under circumstances not justified by this section or pursuant to section six hundred two of this article without appropriate process. Any retention of a child or order for retention of a child not complying with the time limits and other requirements specified in this article shall be void by operation of law.

(g) Petition for appointment of special guardian. -- Upon the verified petition of any person showing:

(1) That any person under the age of eighteen years is threatened with or there is a substantial possibility that the person will suffer death, serious or permanent physical or emotional disability, disfigurement or suffering; and

(2) That disability, disfigurement or suffering is the result of the failure or refusal of any parent, guardian or custodian to procure, consent to or authorize necessary medical treatment, the circuit court of the county in which the person is located may direct the appointment of a special guardian for the purposes of procuring, consenting to and giving authorization for the administration of necessary medical treatment. The circuit court may not consider any petition filed in accordance with this section unless it is accompanied by a supporting affidavit of a licensed physician.

(h) Notice of petition. -- So far as practicable, the parents, guardian or custodian of any person for whose benefit medical treatment is sought shall be given notice of the petition for the appointment of a special guardian under this section. Notice is not necessary if it would cause a delay that would result in the death or irreparable harm to the person for whose benefit medical treatment is sought. Notice may be given in a form and manner as may be necessary under the circumstances.

(i) Discharge of special guardian. -- Upon the termination of necessary medical treatment to any person under this section, the circuit court order the discharge of the special guardian from any further authority, responsibility or duty.

(j) Immunity from civil liability. -- No person appointed special guardian in accordance with this article is civilly liable for any act done by virtue of the authority vested in him or her by order of the circuit court.

§ 49-4-302 Authorizing a family court judge to order custody of a child in emergency situations; requirements; orders; investigative reports; notification required.

(a) Notwithstanding the jurisdictional limitations contained in section two, article two-a, chapter fifty-one of this code, family court judges are authorized to order the department to take emergency custody of a child who is in the physical custody of a party to an action or proceeding before the family court, if the family court judge finds that there is clear and convincing evidence that:

(1) There exists an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child as defined in section two hundred one, article one of this chapter;

(2) The child is not the subject of a pending action before the circuit court alleging abuse and neglect of the child; and

(3) There are no reasonable available alternatives to the emergency custody order.

(b) An order entered pursuant to subsection (a) of this section must include specific written findings.

(c) A copy of the order issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be transmitted forthwith to the department, the circuit court and the prosecuting attorney.

(d) Upon receipt of an order issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the department shall immediately respond and assist the family court judge in emergency placement of the child.

(e)(1) Upon receipt of an order issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the circuit court shall cause to be entered and served, an administrative order in the name of and regarding the affected child, directing the department to submit, within ninety-six hours from the time the child was taken into custody, an investigative report to both the circuit and family court.

(2) The investigative report shall include a statement of whether the department intends to file a petition pursuant to section six hundred two of this article.

(f)(1) An order issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section terminates by operation of law upon expiration of ninety-six hours from the time the child is initially taken into protective custody unless a petition is filed with the circuit court under section six hundred two of this article within ninety-six hours from the time the child is initially taken into protective custody.

(2) The filing of a petition within ninety-six hours from the time the child is initially taken into protective custody extends the emergency custody order issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section until a preliminary hearing is held before the circuit court, unless the circuit court orders otherwise.

(g)(1) Any worker for the department assuming custody of a child pursuant to this section shall immediately notify the parents, parent, grandparents, grandparent, guardian or custodian of the child of the taking of the custody and the reasons therefor if the whereabouts of the parents, parent, grandparents, grandparent, guardian or custodian are known or can be discovered with due diligence and, if not, a notice and explanation shall be given to the child's closest relative if his or her whereabouts are known or can be discovered with due diligence within a reasonable time. An inquiry shall be made of relatives and neighbors and, if an appropriate relative or neighbor is willing to assume custody of the child, the child will temporarily be placed in that person's custody.

(2) In the event no other reasonable alternative is available for temporary placement of a child pursuant to subdivision (1) of this subsection, the child may be housed by the department in an authorized child shelter facility.

§ 49-4-303 Emergency removal by department before filing of petition; conditions; referee; application for emergency custody; order.

Prior to the filing of a petition, a child protective service worker may take the child or children into his or her custody (also known as removing the child) without a court order when:

(1) In the presence of a child protective service worker a child or children are in an emergency situation which constitutes an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child or children, as that phrase is defined in section two hundred one, article one of this chapter; and

(2) The worker has probable cause to believe that the child or children will suffer additional child abuse or neglect or will be removed from the county before a petition can be filed and temporary custody can be ordered.

After taking custody of the child or children prior to the filing of a petition, the worker shall forthwith appear before a circuit judge or referee of the county where custody was taken and immediately apply for an order. If no judge or referee is available, the worker shall appear before a circuit judge or referee of an adjoining county, and immediately apply for an order. This order shall ratify the emergency custody of the child pending the filing of a petition.

The circuit court of every county in the state shall appoint at least one of the magistrates of the county to act as a referee. He or she serves at the will and pleasure of the appointing court, and shall perform the functions prescribed for the position by this subsection.

The parents, guardians or custodians of the child or children may be present at the time and place of application for an order ratifying custody. If at the time the child or children are taken into custody by the worker he or she knows which judge or referee is to receive the application, the worker shall so inform the parents, guardians or custodians.

The application for emergency custody may be on forms prescribed by the Supreme Court of Appeals or prepared by the prosecuting attorney or the applicant, and shall set forth facts from which it may be determined that the probable cause described above in this subsection exists. Upon the sworn testimony or other evidence as the judge or referee deems sufficient, the judge or referee may order the emergency taking by the worker to be ratified. If appropriate under the circumstances, the order may include authorization for an examination as provided in subsection (b), section six hundred three of this article.

If a referee issues an order, the referee shall by telephonic communication have that order orally confirmed by a circuit judge of the circuit or an adjoining circuit who shall, on the next judicial day, enter an order of confirmation. If the emergency taking is ratified by the judge or referee, emergency custody of the child or children is vested in the department until the expiration of the next two judicial days, at which time any child taken into emergency custody shall be returned to the custody of his or her parent or guardian or custodian unless a petition has been filed and custody of the child has been transferred under section six hundred two of this article.

PART IV. MULTIDISCIPLINARY TEAMS, CASE PLANS, TRANSITION PLANS AND AFTERCARE PLANS.

§ 49-4-401 Purpose; system to be a complement to existing programs.

(a) This article:

(1) Provides a system for evaluation of and coordinated service delivery for children who may be victims of abuse or neglect and children undergoing certain status offense and delinquency proceedings;

(2) Establishes, as a complement to other programs of the Department of Health and Human Resources, a multidisciplinary screening, advisory and planning system to assist courts in facilitating permanency planning, following the initiation of judicial proceedings, to recommend alternatives and to coordinate evaluations and in-community services; and

(3) Ensures that children are safe from abuse and neglect and to coordinate investigation of alleged child abuse offenses and competent criminal prosecution of offenders to ensure that safety, as determined appropriate by the prosecuting attorney.

(b) Nothing in this article precludes any multidisciplinary team from considering any case upon the consent of the members of the team.

§ 49-4-402 Multidisciplinary investigative teams; establishment; membership; procedures; coordination among agencies; confidentiality.

(a) The prosecuting attorney of each county shall establish a multidisciplinary investigative team in that county. The multidisciplinary team shall be headed and directed by the prosecuting attorney, or his or her designee, and includes as permanent members:

(1) The prosecuting attorney, or his or her designee;

(2) A local child protective services caseworker from the Department of Health and Human Resources;

(3) A local law-enforcement officer employed by a law-enforcement agency in the county;

(4) A child advocacy center representative, where available;

(5) A health care provider with pediatric and child abuse expertise, where available;

(6) A mental health professional with pediatric and child abuse expertise, where available;

(7) An educator; and

(8) A representative from a licensed domestic violence program serving the county.

The Department of Health and Human Resources and any local law-enforcement agency or agencies selected by the prosecuting attorney shall appoint their representatives to the team by submitting a written designation of the team to the prosecuting attorney of each county within thirty days of the prosecutor's request that the appointment be made. Within fifteen days of the appointment, the prosecuting attorney shall notify the chief judge of each circuit within which the county is situated of the names of the representatives so appointed. Any other person or any other appointee of an agency who may contribute to the team's efforts to assist a minor child as may be determined by the permanent members of the team may also be appointed as a member of the team by the prosecutor with notification to the chief judge.

(b) Any permanent member of the multidisciplinary investigative team shall refer all cases of accidental death of any child reported to their agency and all cases when a child dies while in the custody of the state for investigation and review by the team. The multidisciplinary investigative team shall meet at regular intervals at least once every calendar month.

(c) The investigative team shall be responsible for coordinating or cooperating in the initial and ongoing investigation of all civil and criminal allegations pertinent to cases involving child sexual assault, child sexual abuse, child abuse and neglect and shall make a recommendation to the county prosecuting attorney as to the initiation or commencement of a civil petition and/or criminal prosecution.

(d) State, county and local agencies shall provide the multidisciplinary investigative team with any information requested in writing by the team as allowable by law or upon receipt of a certified copy of the circuit court's order directing the agencies to release information in its possession relating to the child. The team shall assure that all information received and developed in connection with this article remains confidential. For purposes of this section, the term "confidential" shall be construed in accordance with article five of this chapter.

§ 49-4-403 Multidisciplinary treatment planning process; coordination; access to information.

(a)(1) A multidisciplinary treatment planning process for cases initiated pursuant to part six and part seven of article four of this chapter shall be established within each county of the state, either separately or in conjunction with a contiguous county, by the secretary of the department with advice and assistance from the prosecutor's advisory council as set forth in section four, article four, chapter seven of this code. In each circuit, the department shall coordinate with the prosecutor's office, the public defender's office or other counsel representing juveniles to designate, with the approval of the court, at least one day per month on which multidisciplinary team meetings for that circuit shall be held: Provided, That multidisciplinary team meetings may be held on days other than the designated day or days when necessary. The Division of Juvenile Services shall establish a similar treatment planning process for delinquency cases in which the juvenile has been committed to its custody, including those cases in which the juvenile has been committed for examination and diagnosis.

(2) This section does not require a multidisciplinary team meeting to be held prior to temporarily placing a child or juvenile out-of-home under exigent circumstances or upon a court order placing a juvenile in a facility operated by the Division of Juvenile Services.

(b) The case manager in the Department of Health and Human Resources for the child, family or juvenile or the case manager in the Division of Juvenile Services for a juvenile shall convene a treatment team in each case when it is required pursuant to this article.

(1) Prior to disposition, in each case in which a treatment planning team has been convened, the team shall advise the court as to the types of services the team has determined are needed and the type of placement, if any, which will best serve the needs of the child. If the team determines that an out-of-home placement will best serve the needs of the child, the team shall first consider placement with appropriate relatives then with foster care homes, facilities or programs located within the state. The team may only recommend placement in an out-of-state facility if it concludes, after considering the best interests and overall needs of the child, that there are no available and suitable in-state facilities which can satisfactorily meet the specific needs of the child.

(2) Any person authorized by the provisions of this chapter to convene a multidisciplinary team meeting may seek and receive an order of the circuit court setting such meeting and directing attendance. Members of the multidisciplinary team may participate in team meetings by telephone or video conferencing. This subsection does not prevent the respective agencies from designating a person other than the case manager as a facilitator for treatment team meetings. Written notice shall be provided to all team members of the availability to participate by videoconferencing.

(c) The treatment team shall coordinate its activities and membership with local family resource networks and coordinate with other local and regional child and family service planning committees to assure the efficient planning and delivery of child and family services on a local and regional level.

(d) The multidisciplinary treatment team shall be afforded access to information in the possession of the Department of Health and Human Resources, Division of Juvenile Services, law-enforcement agencies and other state, county and local agencies. Those agencies shall cooperate in the sharing of information as may be provided in article five of this chapter or any other relevant provision of law. Any multidisciplinary team member who acquires confidential information may not disclose the information except as permitted by the provisions of this code or court rules.

§ 49-4-404 Court review of service plan; hearing; required findings; order; team member's objections.

(a) In any case in which a multidisciplinary treatment team develops an individualized service plan for a child or family pursuant to this article, the court shall review the proposed service plan to determine if implementation of the plan is in the child's best interests. If the multidisciplinary team cannot agree on a plan or if the court determines not to adopt the team's recommendations, it shall, upon motion or sua sponte, schedule and hold within ten days of the determination, and prior to the entry of an order placing the child in the custody of the department or in an out-of-home setting, a hearing to consider evidence from the team as to its rationale for the proposed service plan. If, after a hearing held pursuant to this section, the court does not adopt the teams's recommended service plan, it shall make specific written findings as to why the team's recommended service plan was not adopted.

(b) In any case in which the court decides to order the child placed in an out-of-state facility or program it shall set forth in the order directing the placement the reasons why the child was not placed in an in-state facility or program.

(c) Any member of the multidisciplinary treatment team who disagrees with recommendations of the team may inform the court of his or her own recommendations and objections to the team's recommendations. The recommendations and objections of the dissenting team member may be made in a hearing on the record, made in writing and served upon each team member and filed with the court and indicated in the case plan, or both made in writing and indicated in the case plan. Upon receiving objections, the court will conduct a hearing pursuant to paragraph (a) of this section.

§ 49-4-405 Multidisciplinary treatment planning process involving child abuse and neglect; team membership; duties; reports; admissions.

(a) Within thirty days of the initiation of a judicial proceeding pursuant to part six, of this article, the Department of Health and Human Services shall convene a multidisciplinary treatment team to assess, plan and implement a comprehensive, individualized service plan for children who are victims of abuse or neglect and their families. The multidisciplinary team shall obtain and utilize any assessments for the children or the adult respondents that it deems necessary to assist in the development of that plan.

(b) In a case initiated pursuant to part six of this article, the treatment team consists of:

(1) The child or family's case manager in the Department of Health and Human Resources;

(2) The adult respondent or respondents;

(3) The child's parent or parents, guardians, any copetitioners, custodial relatives of the child, foster or preadoptive parents;

(4) Any attorney representing an adult respondent or other member of the treatment team;

(5) The child's counsel or the guardian ad litem;

(6) The prosecuting attorney or his or her designee;

(7) A member of a child advocacy center when the child has been processed through the child advocacy center program or programs or it is otherwise appropriate that a member of the child advocacy center participate;

(8) Any court-appointed special advocate assigned to a case;

(9) Any other person entitled to notice and the right to be heard;

(10) An appropriate school official; and

(11) Any other person or agency representative who may assist in providing recommendations for the particular needs of the child and family, including domestic violence service providers.

The child may participate in multidisciplinary treatment team meetings if the child's participation is deemed appropriate by the multidisciplinary treatment team. Unless otherwise ordered by the court, a party whose parental rights have been terminated and his or her attorney may not be given notice of a multidisciplinary treatment team meeting and does not have the right to participate in any treatment team meeting.

(c) Prior to disposition in each case which a treatment planning team has been convened, the team shall advise the court as to the types of services the team has determined are needed and the type of placement, if any, which will best serve the needs of the child. If the team determines that an out-of-home placement will best serve the needs of the child, the team shall first consider placement with appropriate relatives then with foster care homes, facilities or programs located within the state. The team may only recommend placement in an out-of-state facility if it concludes, after considering the best interests and overall needs of the child, that there are no available and suitable in-state facilities which can satisfactorily meet the specific needs of the child.

(d) The multidisciplinary treatment team shall submit written reports to the court as required by the rules governing this type of proceeding or by the court, and shall meet as often as deemed necessary but at least every three months until the case is dismissed from the docket of the court. The multidisciplinary treatment team shall be available for status conferences and hearings as required by the court.

(e) If a respondent or copetitioner admits the underlying allegations of child abuse or neglect, or both abuse and neglect, in the multidisciplinary treatment planning process, his or her statements may not be used in any subsequent criminal proceeding against him or her, except for perjury or false swearing.

§ 49-4-406 Multidisciplinary treatment process for status offenders or delinquents; requirements; custody; procedure; reports; cooperation; inadmissibility of certain statements.

(a) When a juvenile is adjudicated as a status offender pursuant to section seven hundred eleven of this article, the Department of Health and Human Resources shall promptly convene a multidisciplinary treatment team and conduct an assessment, utilizing a standard uniform comprehensive assessment instrument or protocol, including a risk and needs assessment, to determine the juvenile's mental and physical condition, maturity and education level, home and family environment, rehabilitative needs and recommended service plan, which shall be provided in writing to the court and team members. Upon completion of the assessment, the treatment team shall prepare and implement a comprehensive, individualized service plan for the juvenile.

(b) When a juvenile is adjudicated as a delinquent or has been granted a preadjudicatory community supervision period pursuant to section seven hundred eight of this article, the court, either upon its own motion or motion of a party, may require the Department of Health and Human Resources to convene a multidisciplinary treatment team and conduct an assessment, utilizing a standard uniform comprehensive assessment instrument or protocol, including a risk and needs assessment, to determine the juvenile's mental and physical condition, maturity and education level, home and family environment, rehabilitative needs and recommended service plan, which shall be provided in writing to the court and team members. A referral to the Department of Health and Human Resources to convene a multidisciplinary treatment team and to conduct such an assessment shall be made when the court is considering placing the juvenile in the department's custody or placing the juvenile out-of-home at the department's expense pursuant to section seven hundred fourteen of this article. In any delinquency proceeding in which the court requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to convene a multidisciplinary treatment team, the probation officer shall notify the department at least fifteen working days before the court proceeding in order to allow the department sufficient time to convene and develop an individualized service plan for the juvenile.

(c) When a juvenile has been adjudicated and committed to the custody of the Director of the Division of Juvenile Services, including those cases in which the juvenile has been committed for examination and diagnosis, the Division of Juvenile Services shall promptly convene a multidisciplinary treatment team and conduct an assessment, utilizing a standard uniform comprehensive assessment instrument or protocol, including a risk and needs assessment, to determine the juvenile's mental and physical condition, maturity and education level, home and family environment, rehabilitative needs and recommended service plan. Upon completion of the assessment, the treatment team shall prepare and implement a comprehensive, individualized service plan for the juvenile, which shall be provided in writing to the court and team members. In cases where the juvenile is committed as a post-sentence disposition to the custody of the Division of Juvenile Services, the plan shall be reviewed quarterly by the multidisciplinary treatment team. Where a juvenile has been detained in a facility operated by the Division of Juvenile Services without an active service plan for more than sixty days, the director of the facility may call a multidisciplinary team meeting to review the case and discuss the status of the service plan.

(d)(1) The rules of juvenile procedure shall govern the procedure for obtaining any assessment of a juvenile, preparing an individualized service plan and submitting the plan and any assessment to the court.

(2) In juvenile proceedings conducted pursuant to part seven of this article, the following representatives shall serve as members and attend each meeting of the multidisciplinary treatment team, so long as they receive notice at least seven days prior to the meeting:

(A) The juvenile;

(B) The juvenile's case manager in the Department of Health and Human Resources or the Division of Juvenile Services;

(C) The juvenile's parent, guardian or custodian;

(D) The juvenile's attorney;

(E) Any attorney representing a member of the multidisciplinary treatment team;

(F) The prosecuting attorney or his or her designee;

(G) The county school superintendent or the superintendent's designee;

(H) A treatment or service provider with training and clinical experience coordinating behavioral or mental health treatment; and

(I) Any other person or agency representative who may assist in providing recommendations for the particular needs of the juvenile and family, including domestic violence service providers. In delinquency proceedings, the probation officer shall be a member of a multidisciplinary treatment team. When appropriate, the juvenile case manager in the Department of Health and Human Resources and the Division of Juvenile Services shall cooperate in conducting multidisciplinary treatment team meetings when it is in the juvenile's best interest.

(3) Prior to disposition, in each case in which a treatment planning team has been convened, the team shall advise the court as to the types of services the team has determined are needed and type of placement, if any, which will best serve the needs of the child. If the team determines that an out-of-home placement will best serve the needs of the child, the team shall first consider placement at facilities or programs located within the state. The team may only recommend placement in an out-of-state facility if it concludes, after considering the best interests and overall needs of the child, that there are no available and suitable in-state facilities which can satisfactorily meet the specific needs of the child. The multidisciplinary treatment team shall also determine and advise the court as to the individual treatment and rehabilitation plan recommended for the child for either out-of-home placement or community supervision. The plan may focus on reducing the likelihood of reoffending, requirements for the child to take responsibility for his or her actions, completion of evidence-based services or programs or any other relevant goal for the child. The plan may also include opportunities to incorporate the family, custodian or guardian into the treatment and rehabilitation process.

(4) The multidisciplinary treatment team shall submit written reports to the court as required by applicable law or by the court, shall meet with the court at least every three months, as long as the juvenile remains in the legal or physical custody of the state, and shall be available for status conferences and hearings as required by the court. The multidisciplinary treatment team shall monitor progress of the plan identified in subdivision (3) of this subsection and review progress of the plan at the regular meetings held at least every three months pursuant to this section, or at shorter intervals, as ordered by the court, and shall report to the court on the progress of the plan or if additional modification is necessary.

(5) In any case in which a juvenile has been placed out of his or her home except for a temporary placement in a shelter or detention center, the multidisciplinary treatment team shall cooperate with the state agency in whose custody the juvenile is placed to develop an after-care plan. The rules of juvenile procedure and section four hundred nine of this article govern the development of an after-care plan for a juvenile, the submission of the plan to the court and any objection to the after-care plan.

(6) If a juvenile respondent admits the underlying allegations of the case initiated pursuant to part VII of this article, in the multidisciplinary treatment planning process, his or her statements may not be used in any juvenile or criminal proceedings against the juvenile, except for perjury or false swearing.

§ 49-4-407 Team directors; records; case logs.

All persons directing any team created pursuant to this article shall maintain records of each meeting indicating the name and position of persons attending each meeting and the number of cases discussed at the meeting, including a designation of whether or not that case was previously discussed by any multidisciplinary team. Further, all investigative teams shall maintain a log of all cases to indicate the number of referrals to that team, whether or not a police report was filed with the prosecuting attorney's office, whether or not a petition was sought pursuant to part six of this article or whether or not a criminal complaint was issued and a case was criminally prosecuted. All treatment teams shall maintain a log of all cases to indicate the basis for failure to review a case for a period in excess of six months.

§ 49-4-408 Unified child and family case plans; treatment teams; programs; agency requirements.

(a) The Department of Health and Human Resources shall develop a unified child and family case plan for every family wherein a person has been referred to the department after being allowed an improvement period or where the child is placed in foster care. The case plan must be filed within sixty days of the child coming into foster care or within thirty days of the inception of the improvement period, whichever occurs first. The department may also prepare a case plan for any person who voluntarily seeks child abuse and neglect services from the department, or who is referred to the department by another public agency or private organization. The case plan provisions shall comply with federal law and the rules of procedure for child abuse and neglect proceedings.

(b) The department shall convene a multidisciplinary treatment team, which shall develop the case plan. Parents, guardians or custodians shall participate fully in the development of the case plan, and the child shall also fully participate if sufficiently mature and the child's participation is otherwise appropriate. The case plan may be modified from time to time to allow for flexibility in goal development, and in each case the modifications shall be submitted to the court in writing. Reasonable efforts to place a child for adoption or with a legal guardian may be made at the same time as reasonable efforts are being made to prevent removal or to make it possible for a child to return safely home. The court shall examine the proposed case plan or any modification thereof, and upon a finding by the court that the plan or modified plan can be easily communicated, explained and discussed so as to make the participants accountable and able to understand the reasons for any success or failure under the plan, the court shall inform the participants of the probable action of the court if goals are met or not met.

(c) In furtherance of the provisions of this article, the department shall, within the limits of available funds, establish programs and services for the following purposes:

(1) For the development and establishment of training programs for professional and paraprofessional personnel in the fields of medicine, law, education, social work and other relevant fields who are engaged in, or intend to work in, the field of the prevention, identification and treatment of child abuse and neglect; and training programs for children, and for persons responsible for the welfare of children, in methods of protecting children from child abuse and neglect;

(2) For the establishment and maintenance of centers, serving defined geographic areas, staffed by multidisciplinary teams and community teams of personnel trained in the prevention, identification and treatment of child abuse and neglect cases, to provide a broad range of services related to child abuse and neglect, including direct support as well as providing advice and consultation to individuals, agencies and organizations which request the services;

(3) For furnishing services of multidisciplinary teams and community teams, trained in the prevention, identification and treatment of child abuse and neglect cases, on a consulting basis to small communities where the services are not available;

(4) For other innovative programs and projects that show promise of successfully identifying, preventing or remedying the causes of child abuse and neglect, including, but not limited to, programs and services designed to improve and maintain parenting skills, programs and projects for parent self help, and for prevention and treatment of drug-related child abuse and neglect; and

(5) Assisting public agencies or nonprofit private organizations or combinations thereof in making applications for grants from, or in entering into contracts with, the federal Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services for demonstration programs and projects designed to identify, prevent and treat child abuse and neglect.

(d) Agencies, organizations and programs funded to carry out the purposes of this section shall be structured so as to comply with any applicable federal law, any regulation of the federal Department of Health and Human Services or its secretary, and any final comprehensive plan of the federal advisory board on child abuse and neglect. In funding organizations, the department shall, to the extent feasible, ensure that parental organizations combating child abuse and neglect receive preferential treatment.

§ 49-4-409 After-care plans; contents; written comments; contacts; objections; courts.

(a) Prior to the discharge of a child from any out-of-home placement to which the juvenile was committed pursuant to this chapter, the department or the Division of Juvenile Services shall convene a meeting of the multidisciplinary treatment team to which the child has been referred or, if no referral has been made, convene a multidisciplinary treatment team for any child for which a multidisciplinary treatment plan is required by this article and forward a copy of the juvenile's proposed after-care plan to the court which committed the juvenile. A copy of the plan shall also be sent to: (1) The child's parent, guardian or custodian; (2) the child's lawyer; (3) the child's probation officer or community mental health center professional; (4) the prosecuting attorney of the county in which the original commitment proceedings were held; and (5) the principal of the school which the child will attend. The plan shall have a list of the names and addresses of these persons attached to it.

(b) The after-care plan shall contain a detailed description of the education, counseling and treatment which the child received at the out-of-home placement and it shall also propose a plan for education, counseling and treatment for the child upon the child's discharge. The plan shall also contain a description of any problems the child has, including the source of those problems, and it shall propose a manner for addressing those problems upon discharge.

(c) Within twenty-one days of receiving the plan, the child's probation officer or community mental health center professional shall submit written comments upon the plan to the court which committed the child. Any other person who received a copy of the plan pursuant to subsection (a) of this section may submit written comments upon the plan to the court which committed the child. Any person who submits comments upon the plan shall send a copy of those comments to every other person who received a copy of the plan.

(d) Within twenty-one days of receiving the plan, the child's probation officer or community mental health center professional shall contact all persons, organizations and agencies which are to be involved in executing the plan to determine whether they are capable of executing their responsibilities under the plan and to further determine whether they are willing to execute their responsibilities under the plan.

(e) If adverse comments or objections regarding the plan are submitted to the circuit court, it shall, within forty-five days of receiving the plan, hold a hearing to consider the plan and the adverse comments or objections. Any person, organization or agency which has responsibilities in executing the plan, or their representatives, may be required to appear at the hearing unless they are excused by the circuit court. Within five days of the hearing, the circuit court shall issue an order which adopts the plan as submitted or as modified in response to any comments or objections.

(f) If no adverse comments or objections are submitted, a hearing need not be held. In that case, the circuit court shall consider the plan as submitted and shall, within forty-five days of receiving the plan, issue an order which adopts the plan as submitted.

(g) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsections (e) and (f) of this section, the plan which is adopted by the circuit court shall be in the best interests of the child and shall also be in conformity with West Virginia's interest in youths as embodied in this chapter.

(h) The court which committed the child shall appoint the child's probation officer or community mental health center professional to act as supervisor of the plan. The supervisor shall report the child's progress under the plan to the court every sixty days or until the court determines that no report or no further care is necessary.

§ 49-4-410 Other agencies of government required to cooperate.

State, county and local agencies shall provide the multidisciplinary teams with any information requested in writing by the team as allowable by law or upon receipt of a certified copy of the circuit court's order directing the agencies to release information in its possession relating to the child. The team shall assure that all information received and developed in connection with this article remain confidential. For purposes of this section, the term "confidential" shall be construed in accordance with article five of this chapter.

§ 49-4-411 Law enforcement; prosecution; interference with performance of duties.

No multidisciplinary team may take any action which, in the determination of the prosecuting attorney or his or her assistant, impairs the ability of the prosecuting attorney, his or her assistant, or any law-enforcement officer to perform his or her statutory duties.

§ 49-4-412 Exemption from multidisciplinary team review before emergency out-of-home placements.

Notwithstanding any provision of this article to the contrary, a multidisciplinary team meeting may not be required before temporary out-of-home placement of a child in an emergency circumstance or for purposes of assessment as provided by this article. As soon a practicable after the emergency circumstance, the multidisciplinary treatment team shall convene to explore placement options.

§ 49-4-413. Individualized case planning.

(a) For any juvenile ordered to probation supervision pursuant to section seven hundred fourteen, article four of this chapter, the probation officer assigned to the juvenile shall develop and implement an individualized case plan in consultation with the juvenile's parents, guardian or custodian, and other appropriate parties, and based upon the results of a risk and needs assessment conducted within the last six months prior to the disposition to probation. The probation officer shall work with the juvenile and his or her family, guardian or custodian to implement the case plan following disposition. At a minimum, the case plan shall:

(1) Identify the actions to be taken by the juvenile and, if appropriate, the juvenile's parents, guardian or custodian to ensure future lawful conduct and compliance with the court's disposition order; and

(2) Identify the services to be offered and provided to the juvenile and, if appropriate, the juvenile's parents, guardian or custodian and may include services to address: Mental health and substance abuse issues; education; individual, group and family counseling services; community restoration; or other relevant concerns identified by the probation officer.

(b) For any juvenile disposed to an out-of-home placement with the department, the department shall ensure that the residential service provider develops and implements an individualized case plan based upon the recommendations of the multidisciplinary team pursuant to section four hundred six, article four of this chapter and the results of a risk and needs assessment. At a minimum, the case plan shall include:

(1) Specific treatment goals and the actions to be taken by the juvenile in order to demonstrate satisfactory attainment of each goal;

(2) The services to be offered and provided by the residential service providers; and

(3) A detailed plan designed to assure appropriate reintegration of the juvenile to his or her family, guardian, school and community following the satisfactory completion of the case plan treatment goals, including a protocol and timeline for engaging the parents, guardians or custodians prior to the release of the juvenile.

(c) For any juvenile committed to the Division of Juvenile Services, the Division of Juvenile Services shall develop and implement an individualized case plan based upon the recommendations made to the court by the multidisciplinary team pursuant to section four hundred six, article four of this chapter and the results of a risk and needs assessment. At a minimum, the case plan shall include:

(1) Specific correctional goals and the actions to be taken by the juvenile to demonstrate satisfactory attainment of each goal;

(2) The services to be offered and provided by the Division of Juvenile Services and any contracted service providers; and

(3) A detailed plan designed to assure appropriate reintegration of the juvenile to his or her family, guardian, school and community following the satisfactory completion of the case plan treatment goals, including a protocol and timeline for engaging the parents, guardians or custodians prior to the release of the juvenile.

PART V. DUTIES OF THE PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

§ 49-4-501 Prosecuting attorney representation of the Department of Health and Human Resources; conflict resolution.

(a) The prosecuting attorney shall render to the Department of Health and Human Resources, without additional compensation, the legal services as the department may require. This section shall not be construed to prohibit the department from developing plans for cooperation with courts, prosecuting attorneys, and other law-enforcement officials in a manner as to permit the state and its citizens to obtain maximum fiscal benefits under federal laws, rules and regulations.

(b) Nothing in this code may be construed to limit the authority of a prosecuting attorney to file an abuse or neglect petition, including the duties and responsibilities owed to its client the Department of Health and Human Resources, in his or her fulfillment of the provisions of this article.

(c) Whenever, pursuant to this chapter, a prosecuting attorney acts as counsel for the Department of Health and Human Resources, and a dispute arises between the prosecuting attorney and the department's representative because an action proposed by the other is believed to place the child at imminent risk of abuse or serious neglect, either the prosecuting attorney or the department's representative may contact the secretary of the department and the executive director of the West Virginia Prosecuting Attorneys Institute for prompt mediation and resolution. The secretary may designate either his or her general counsel or the director of social services to act as his or her designee and the executive director may designate an objective prosecuting attorney as his or her designee.

§ 49-4-502 Prosecuting attorney to represent and cooperate with persons other than the department in child abuse and neglect matters; duties.

It is the duty of every prosecuting attorney to fully and promptly cooperate with persons seeking to apply for relief, including co-petitioners with the department, under this article in all cases of suspected child abuse and neglect; to promptly prepare applications and petitions for relief requested by those persons, to investigate reported cases of suspected child abuse and neglect for possible criminal activity; and to report at least annually to the grand jury regarding the discharge of his or her duties with respect thereto.

§ 49-4-503 Prosecuting attorney to represent petitioner in juvenile cases.

The prosecuting attorney shall represent the petitioner in all proceedings under this article before the court judge or magistrate having juvenile jurisdiction.

§ 49-4-504 Prosecuting attorney duty to establish multidisciplinary investigative teams.

The prosecuting attorney of each county shall establish a multidisciplinary investigative team in that county, pursuant to section four hundred two of this article, and section five, article four of chapter seven.

PART VI. PROCEDURES IN CASES OF CHILD NEGLECT OR ABUSE.

§ 49-4-601 Petition to court when child believed neglected or abused; venue; notice; right to counsel; continuing legal education; findings; proceedings; procedure.

(a) Petitioner and venue. -- If the department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or if the petition is being brought by the department, in the county in which the custodial respondent or other named party abuser resides, or in which the abuse or neglect occurred, or to the judge of the court in vacation. Under no circumstance may a party file a petition in more than one county based on the same set of facts.

(b) Contents of Petition. -- The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how the conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought.

(c) Court action upon filing of petition. -- Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall appoint counsel for the child. When there is an order for temporary custody pursuant to this article, the preliminary hearing shall be held within ten days of the order continuing or transferring custody, unless a continuance for a reasonable time is granted to a date certain, for good cause shown.

(d) Department action upon filing of the petition. -- At the time of the institution of any proceeding under this article, the department shall provide supportive services in an effort to remedy circumstances detrimental to a child.

(e) Notice of hearing. --

(1) The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to the parents or custodian at least five days' actual notice of a preliminary hearing and at least ten days' notice of any other hearing.

(2) Notice shall be given to the department, any foster or preadoptive parent, and any relative providing care for the child.

(3) In cases where personal service within West Virginia cannot be obtained after due diligence upon any parent or other custodian, a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing shall be mailed to the person by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested, to the last known address of the person. If the person signs the certificate, service shall be complete and the certificate shall be filed as proof of the service with the clerk of the circuit court.

(4) If service cannot be obtained by personal service or by certified mail, notice shall be by publication as a Class II legal advertisement in compliance with article three, chapter fifty-nine of this code.

(5) A notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the hearing, the right to counsel of the child and parents or other custodians at every stage of the proceedings and the fact that the proceedings can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights.

(6) Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice may not be construed as a waiver.

(f) Right to counsel. --

(1) In any proceeding under this article, the child, his or her parents and his or her legally established custodian or other persons standing in loco parentis to him or her has the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings and shall be informed by the court of their right to be so represented and that if they cannot pay for the services of counsel, that counsel will be appointed.

(2) Counsel shall be appointed in the initial order. For parents, legal guardians, and other persons standing in loco parentis, the representation may only continue after the first appearance if the parent or other persons standing in loco parentis cannot pay for the services of counsel.

(3) Counsel for other parties shall only be appointed upon request for appointment of counsel. If the requesting parties have not retained counsel and cannot pay for the services of counsel, the court shall, by order entered of record, appoint an attorney or attorneys to represent the other party or parties and so inform the parties.

(4) Under no circumstances may the same attorney represent both the child and the other party or parties, nor may the same attorney represent both parents or custodians. However, one attorney may represent both parents or custodians where both parents or guardians consent to this representation after the attorney fully discloses to the client the possible conflict and where the attorney assures the court that she or he is able to represent each client without impairing her or his professional judgment; however, if more than one child from a family is involved in the proceeding, one attorney may represent all the children.

(5) A parent who is a copetitioner is entitled to his or her own attorney. The court may allow to each attorney so appointed a fee in the same amount which appointed counsel can receive in felony cases.

(g) Continuing education for counsel. -- Any attorney representing a party under this article shall receive a minimum of eight hours of continuing legal education training per reporting period on child abuse and neglect procedure and practice. In addition to this requirement, any attorney appointed to represent a child must first complete training on representation of children that is approved by the administrative office of the Supreme Court of Appeals. The Supreme Court of Appeals shall develop procedures for approval and certification of training required under this section. Where no attorney has completed the training required by this subsection, the court shall appoint a competent attorney with demonstrated knowledge of child welfare law to represent the parent or child. Any attorney appointed pursuant to this section shall perform all duties required of an attorney licensed to practice law in the State of West Virginia.

(h) Right to be heard. -- In any proceeding pursuant to this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. Foster parents, preadoptive parents, and relative caregivers shall also have a meaningful opportunity to be heard.

(i) Findings of the court. -- Where relevant, the court shall consider the efforts of the department to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether the child is abused or neglected and-whether the respondent is abusing, neglecting, or, if applicable, a battered parent, all of which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing evidence.

(j) Priority of proceedings. -- Any petition filed and any proceeding held under this article shall, to the extent practicable, be given priority over any other civil action before the court, except proceedings under section three hundred nine, article twenty-seven, chapter forty-eight of this code and actions in which trial is in progress. Any petition filed under this article shall be docketed immediately upon filing. Any hearing to be held at the end of an improvement period and any other hearing to be held during any proceedings under this article shall be held as nearly as practicable on successive days and, with respect to the hearing to be held at the end of an improvement period, shall be held as close in time as possible after the end of the improvement period and shall be held within thirty days of the termination of the improvement period.

(k) Procedural safeguards. -- The petition may not be taken as confessed. A transcript or recording shall be made of all proceedings unless waived by all parties to the proceeding. The rules of evidence shall apply. Following the court's determination, it shall be inquired of the parents or custodians whether or not appeal is desired and the response transcribed. A negative response may not be construed as a waiver. The evidence shall be transcribed and made available to the parties or their counsel as soon as practicable, if the same is required for purposes of further proceedings. If an indigent person intends to pursue further proceedings, the court reporter shall furnish a transcript of the hearing without cost to the indigent person if an affidavit is filed stating that he or she cannot pay therefor.

§ 49-4-602 Petition to court when child believed neglected or abused; temporary care, custody, and control of child at different stages of proceeding; temporary care; orders; emergency removal; when reasonable efforts to preserve family are unnecessary.

(a)(1) Temporary care, custody, and control upon filing of the petition. -- Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the care, custody, and control of the department or a responsible person who is not the custodial parent or guardian of the child, if it finds that:

(A) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child; and

(B) There are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child, including, but not limited to, the provision of medical, psychiatric, psychological or homemaking services in the child's present custody.

(2) Where the alleged abusing person, if known, is a member of a household, the court shall not allow placement pursuant to this section of the child or children in the home unless the alleged abusing person is or has been precluded from visiting or residing in the home by judicial order.

(3) In a case where there is more than one child in the home, or in the temporary care, custody or control of the alleged offending parent, the petition shall so state. Notwithstanding the fact that the allegations of abuse or neglect may pertain to less than all of those children, each child in the home for whom relief is sought shall be made a party to the proceeding. Even though the acts of abuse or neglect alleged in the petition were not directed against a specific child who is named in the petition, the court shall order the removal of the child, pending final disposition, if it finds that there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and a lack of reasonable available alternatives to removal.

(4) The initial order directing custody shall contain an order appointing counsel and scheduling the preliminary hearing, and upon its service shall require the immediate transfer of care, custody, and control of the child or children to the department or a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian, or other custodian. The court order shall state:

(A) That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and why; and

(B) Whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and prevent the placement or that the emergency situation made those efforts unreasonable or impossible. The order may also direct any party or the department to initiate or become involved in services to facilitate reunification of the family.

(b) Temporary care, custody and control at preliminary hearing. -- Whether or not the court orders immediate transfer of custody as provided in subsection (a) of this section, if the facts alleged in the petition demonstrate to the court that there exists imminent danger to the child, the court may schedule a preliminary hearing giving the respondents at least five days' actual notice. If the court finds at the preliminary hearing that there are no alternatives less drastic than removal of the child and that a hearing on the petition cannot be scheduled in the interim period, the court may order that the child be delivered into the temporary care, custody, and control of the department or a responsible person or agency found by the court to be a fit and proper person for the temporary care of the child for a period not exceeding sixty days. The court order shall state:

(1) That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and set forth the reasons therefor;

(2) Whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and to prevent the child's removal from his or her home;

(3) Whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and to prevent the placement or that the emergency situation made those efforts unreasonable or impossible;

(4) Whether or not the department made reasonable accommodations in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, 42 U.S.C. § 12101, et seq., to parents with disabilities in order to allow them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services; and

(5) What efforts should be made by the department, if any, to facilitate the child's return home. If the court grants an improvement period as provided in section six hundred ten of this article, the sixty-day limit upon temporary custody is waived.

(c) Emergency removal by department during pendency of case. -- Regardless of whether the court has previously granted the department care and custody of a child, if the department takes physical custody of a child during the pendency of a child abuse and neglect case (also known as removing the child) due to a change in circumstances and without a court order issued at the time of the removal, the department must immediately notify the court and a hearing shall take place within ten days to determine if there is imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and there is no reasonably available alternative to removal of the child. The court findings and order shall be consistent with subsections (a) and (b) of this section.

(d) Situations when reasonable efforts to preserve the family are not required. -- For purposes of the court's consideration of temporary custody pursuant to subsection (a), (b), or (c) of this section, the department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family if the court determines:

(1) The parent has subjected the child, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent to aggravated circumstances which include, but are not limited to, abandonment, torture, chronic abuse and sexual abuse;

(2) The parent has:

(A) Committed murder of the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent;

(B) Committed voluntary manslaughter of the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent;

(C) Attempted or conspired to commit murder or voluntary manslaughter or been an accessory before or after the fact to either crime;

(D) Committed unlawful or malicious wounding that results in serious bodily injury to the child, the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, to another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent;

(E) Committed sexual assault or sexual abuse of the child, the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent; or

(F) Has been required by state or federal law to register with a sex offender registry, and the court has determined in consideration of the nature and circumstances surrounding the prior charges against that parent, that the child's interests would not be promoted by a preservation of the family; or

(3) The parental rights of the parent to another child have been terminated involuntarily.

§ 49-4-603 Medical and mental examinations; limitation of evidence; probable cause; testimony; judge or referee.

(a)(1) At any time during proceedings under this article the court may, upon its own motion or upon motion of the child or other parties, order the child or other parties to be examined by a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist, and may require testimony from the expert, subject to cross-examination and the rules of evidence.

(2) The court may not terminate parental or custodial rights of a party solely because the party refuses to submit to the examination, nor may the court hold a party in contempt for refusing to submit to an examination.

(3) The physician, psychologist or psychiatrist shall be allowed to testify as to the conclusions reached from hospital, medical, psychological or laboratory records provided the same are produced at the hearing.

(4) If the child, parent or custodian is indigent, the witnesses shall be compensated out of the Treasury of the State, upon certificate of the court wherein the case is pending.

(5) No evidence acquired as a result of an examination of the parent or any other person having custody of the child may be used against the person in any subsequent criminal proceedings against the person.

(b)(1) If a person with authority to file a petition under this article shall have probable cause to believe that evidence exists that a child has been abused or neglected and that the evidence may be found by a medical examination, the person may apply to a judge or juvenile referee for an order to take the child into custody for delivery to a physician or hospital for examination.

(2) The application may be on forms prescribed by the Supreme Court of Appeals or prepared by the prosecuting attorney or the applicant, and shall set forth facts from which it may be determined that probable cause exists for the belief.

(3) Upon sworn testimony or other evidence as the judge or referee deems sufficient, the judge or referee may order any law-enforcement officer to take the child into custody and deliver the child to a physician or hospital for examination.

(4) If a referee issues an order the referee shall by telephonic communication have such order orally confirmed by a circuit judge of the circuit or an adjoining circuit who shall, on the next judicial day, enter an order of confirmation.

(5) Any child protection worker and the child's parents, guardians or custodians may accompany the officer for examination.

(6) After the examination the officer may return the child to the custody of his or her parent, guardian or custodian, retain custody of the child or deliver custody to the state department until the end of the next judicial day, at which time the child shall be returned to the custody of his or her parent, guardian or custodian unless a petition has been filed and custody of the child has been transferred to the department under section six hundred two of this article.

§ 49-4-604 Disposition of neglected or abused children; case plans; dispositions; factors to be considered; reunification; orders; alternative dispositions.

(a) Child and family case plans. -- Following a determination pursuant to section six hundred two of this article wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. The term "case plan" means a written document that includes, where applicable, the requirements of the family case plan as provided in section four hundred eight of this article and that also includes, at a minimum, the following:

(1) A description of the type of home or institution in which the child is to be placed, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the placement and how the agency which is responsible for the child plans to assure that the child receives proper care and that services are provided to the parents, child, and foster parents in order to improve the conditions that made the child unsafe in the care of his or her parent(s), including any reasonable accommodations in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, 42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq., to parents with disabilities in order to allow them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services;

(2) A plan to facilitate the return of the child to his or her own home or the concurrent permanent placement of the child; and address the needs of the child while in relative or foster care, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the services that have been provided to the child.

The term "permanency plan" refers to that part of the case plan which is designed to achieve a permanent home for the child in the least restrictive setting available. The plan must document efforts to ensure that the child is returned home within approximate time lines for reunification as set out in the plan. Reasonable efforts to place a child for adoption or with a legal guardian should be made at the same time, or concurrent with, reasonable efforts to prevent removal or to make it possible for a child to return to the care of his or her parent(s) safely. If reunification is not the permanency plan for the child, the plan must state why reunification is not appropriate and detail the alternative, concurrent permanent placement plans for the child to include approximate time lines for when the placement is expected to become a permanent placement. This case plan shall serve as the family case plan for parents of abused or neglected children. Copies of the child's case plan shall be sent to the child's attorney and parent, guardian or custodian or their counsel at least five days prior to the dispositional hearing. The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard.

(b) Disposition decisions. -- The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:

(1) Dismiss the petition;

(2) Refer the child, the abusing parent, the battered parent or other family members to a community agency for needed assistance and dismiss the petition;

(3) Return the child to his or her own home under supervision of the department;

(4) Order terms of supervision calculated to assist the child and any abusing parent or battered parent or parents or custodian which prescribe the manner of supervision and care of the child and which are within the ability of any parent or parents or custodian to perform;

(5) Upon a finding that the abusing parent or battered parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the care, custody, and control of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency, or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court. The court order shall state:

(A) That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and why;

(B) Whether or not the department has made reasonable efforts, with the child's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family, or some portion thereof, and to prevent or eliminate the need for removing the child from the child's home and to make it possible for the child to safely return home;

(C) Whether the department has made reasonable accommodations in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, 42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq., to parents with disabilities in order to allow them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services;

(D) What efforts were made or that the emergency situation made those efforts unreasonable or impossible; and

(E) The specific circumstances of the situation which made those efforts unreasonable if services were not offered by the department. The court order shall also determine under what circumstances the child's commitment to the department are to continue. Considerations pertinent to the determination include whether the child should:

(i) Be considered for legal guardianship;

(ii) Be considered for permanent placement with a fit and willing relative; or

(iii) Be placed in another planned permanent living arrangement, but only in cases where the child has attained 16 years of age and the department has documented to the circuit court a compelling reason for determining that it would not be in the best interests of the child to follow one of the options set forth in subparagraphs (i) or (ii) of this paragraph. The court may order services to meet the special needs of the child. Whenever the court transfers custody of a youth to the department, an appropriate order of financial support by the parents or guardians shall be entered in accordance with part eight of this article; and

(6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency. The court may award sole custody of the child to a nonabusing battered parent. If the court shall so find, then in fixing its dispositional order the court shall consider the following factors:

(A) The child's need for continuity of care and caretakers;

(B) The amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment; and

(C) Other factors as the court considers necessary and proper. Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights. No adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final. In determining whether or not parental rights should be terminated, the court shall consider the efforts made by the department to provide remedial and reunification services to the parent. The court order shall state:

(i) That continuation in the home is not in the best interest of the child and why;

(ii) Why reunification is not in the best interests of the child;

(iii) Whether or not the department made reasonable efforts, with the child's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family, or some portion thereof, and to prevent the placement or to eliminate the need for removing the child from the child's home and to make it possible for the child to safely return home, or that the emergency situation made those efforts unreasonable or impossible; and

(iv) Whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve and reunify the family, or some portion thereof, including a description of what efforts were made or that those efforts were unreasonable due to specific circumstances.

(7) For purposes of the court's consideration of the disposition custody of a child pursuant to this subsection, the department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family if the court determines:

(A) The parent has subjected the child, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent to aggravated circumstances which include, but are not limited to, abandonment, torture, chronic abuse and sexual abuse;

(B) The parent has:

(i) Committed murder of the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent;

(ii) Committed voluntary manslaughter of the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent;

(iii) Attempted or conspired to commit murder or voluntary manslaughter or been an accessory before or after the fact to either crime;

(iv) Committed a felonious assault that results in serious bodily injury to the child, the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, to another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent; or

(v) Committed sexual assault or sexual abuse of the child, the child's other parent, guardian or custodian, another child of the parent or any other child residing in the same household or under the temporary or permanent custody of the parent;

(C) The parental rights of the parent to another child have been terminated involuntarily;

(D) A parent has been required by state or federal law to register with a sex offender registry, and the court has determined in consideration of the nature and circumstances surrounding the prior charges against that parent, that the child's interests would not be promoted by a preservation of the family.

(c) As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" means that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help. Those conditions exist in the following circumstances, which are not exclusive:

(1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and the person or persons have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning;

(2) The abusing parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the child's return to their care, custody and control;

(3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child;

(4) The abusing parent or parents have abandoned the child;

(5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, or have sexually abused or sexually exploited the child, and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child;

(6) The battered parent's parenting skills have been seriously impaired and the person has willfully refused or is presently unwilling or unable to cooperate in the development of a reasonable treatment plan or has not adequately responded to or followed through with the recommended and appropriate treatment plan.

(d) The court may, as an alternative disposition, allow the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed six months. During this period the court shall require the parent to rectify the conditions upon which the determination was based. The court may order the child to be placed with the parents, or any person found to be a fit and proper person, for the temporary care of the child during the period. At the end of the period, the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the conditions have been adequately improved and at the conclusion of the hearing shall make a further dispositional order in accordance with this section.

§ 49-4-605 When department efforts to terminate parental rights are required.

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the department shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights:

(1) If a child has been in foster care for fifteen of the most recent twenty-two months as determined by the earlier of the date of the first judicial finding that the child is subjected to abuse or neglect or the date which is sixty days after the child is removed from the home;

(2) If a court has determined the child is abandoned, tortured, sexually abused, or chronically abused; or

(3) If a court has determined the parent has committed murder or voluntary manslaughter of another of his or her children, another child in the household, or the other parent of his or her children; has attempted or conspired to commit murder or voluntary manslaughter or has been an accessory before or after the fact of either crime; has committed unlawful or malicious wounding resulting in serious bodily injury to the child or to another of his or her children, another child in the household, or to the other parent of his or her children; or the parental rights of the parent to another child have been terminated involuntarily.

(b) The department may determine not to file a petition to terminate parental rights when:

(1) At the option of the department, the child has been placed permanently with a relative by court order;

(2) The department has documented in the case plan made available for court review a compelling reason, including, but not limited to, the child's age and preference regarding termination or the child's placement in custody of the department based on any proceedings initiated under part seven of this article, that filing the petition would not be in the best interests of the child; or

(3) The department has not provided, when reasonable efforts to return a child to the family are required, the services to the child's family as the department deems necessary for the safe return of the child to the home.

§ 49-4-606 Modification of dispositional orders; hearings; treatment team; unadopted children.

(a) Upon motion of a child, a child's parent or custodian or the department alleging a change of circumstances requiring a different disposition, the court shall conduct a hearing pursuant to section six hundred four of this article and may modify a dispositional order if the court finds by clear and convincing evidence a material change of circumstances and that the modification is in the child's best interests. A dispositional order may not be modified after the child has been adopted, except as provided in subsections (b) and (c) of this section. Adequate and timely notice of any motion for modification shall be given to the child's counsel, counsel for the child's parent or custodian, the department and any person entitled to notice and the right to be heard. The circuit court of origin has exclusive jurisdiction over placement of the child, and the placement may not be disrupted or delayed by any administrative process of the department.

(b) If the child is removed or relinquished from an adoptive home or other permanent placement after the case has been dismissed, any party with notice thereof and the receiving agency shall promptly report the matter to the circuit court of origin, the department and the child's counsel, and the court shall schedule a permanency hearing within sixty days of the report to the circuit court, with notice given to any appropriate parties and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. The department shall convene a multidisciplinary treatment team meeting within thirty days of the receipt of notice of permanent placement disruption.

(c) If a child has not been adopted, the child or department may move the court to place the child with a parent or custodian whose rights have been terminated and/or restore the parent's or guardian's rights. Under these circumstances, the court may order the placement and/or restoration of a parent's or guardian's rights if it finds by clear and convincing evidence a material change of circumstances and that the placement and/or restoration is in the child's best interests.

§ 49-4-607 Consensual termination of parental rights.

An agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights are valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud. Where during the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a parent offers voluntarily relinquish of his or her parental rights, and the relinquishment is accepted by the circuit court, the relinquishment may, without further evidence, be used as the basis of an order of adjudication of abuse and neglect by that parent of his or her children.

§ 49-4-608 Permanency hearing; frequency; transitional planning; out-of-state placements; findings; notice; permanent placement review.

(a) Permanency hearing when reasonable efforts are not required. -- If the court finds, pursuant to this article, that the department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, then, notwithstanding any other provision, a permanency hearing must be held within thirty days following the entry of the court order so finding, and a permanent placement review hearing must be conducted at least once every ninety days thereafter until a permanent placement is achieved.

(b) Permanency hearing every twelve months until permanency is achieved. -- If, twelve months after receipt by the department or its authorized agent of physical care, custody, and control of a child either by a court-ordered placement or by a voluntary agreement, the department has not placed a child in an adoptive home; placed the child with a natural parent, placed the child in legal guardianship, or permanently placed the child with a fit and willing relative, the court shall hold a permanency hearing. The department shall file a progress report with the court detailing the efforts that have been made to place the child in a permanent home and copies of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan as defined in section two hundred one, article one, and section six hundred four, article four of this chapter. Copies of the report shall be sent to the parties and all persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. The court shall schedule a hearing, giving notice and the right to be present to the child's attorney; the child; the child's parents; the child's guardians; the child's foster parents; any preadoptive parent or any relative providing care for the child; any person entitled to notice and the right to be heard; and other persons as the court may, in its discretion, direct. The child's presence may be waived by the child's attorney at the request of the child or if the child is younger than twelve years and would suffer emotional harm. The purpose of the hearing is to review the child's case, to determine whether and under what conditions the child's commitment to the department shall continue, to determine what efforts are necessary to provide the child with a permanent home, and to determine if the department has made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan. The court shall conduct another permanency hearing within twelve months thereafter for each child who remains in the care, custody, and control of the department until the child is placed in an adoptive home, returned to his or her parents, placed in legal guardianship, or permanently placed with a fit and willing relative.

(c) Transitional planning for older children. -- In the case of a child who has attained sixteen years of age, the court shall determine the services needed to assist the child to make the transition from foster care to independent living. The child's case plan should specify services aimed at transitioning the child into adulthood. When a child turns seventeen, or as soon as a child aged seventeen comes into a case, the department must immediately provide the child with assistance and support in developing a transition plan that is personalized at the direction of the child. The plan must include specific options on housing, health insurance, education, local opportunities for mentors, continuing support services, work force support, and employment services, and the plan should be as detailed as the child may elect. In addition to these requirements, when a child with special needs turns seventeen, or as soon as a child aged seventeen with special needs comes into a case, he or she is entitled to the appointment of a department adult services worker to the multidisciplinary treatment team and coordination between the multidisciplinary treatment team and other transition planning teams, such as special education individualized education planning (IEP) teams.

(d) Out-of-state placements. -- In any case in which the court decides to order the child placed in an out-of-state facility or program it shall set forth in the order directing the placement the reasons why the child was not placed in an in-state facility or program. If the child is to be placed with a relative or other responsible person out of state, the court shall use judicial leadership to help expedite the process under the Interstate Compact for the Placement of Children provided in part one, article seven of this chapter and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act provided in article twenty, chapter forty-eight of this code.

(e) Findings in order. -- At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall, in accordance with the best interests of the child, enter an order containing all the appropriate findings. The court order shall state:

(1) Whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and to prevent out-of-home placement or that the specific situation made the effort unreasonable;

(2) Whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan and concurrent plan for the child;

(3) The appropriateness of the child's current placement, including its distance from the child's home and whether or not it is the least restrictive one (most family-like one) available;

(4) The appropriateness of the current educational setting and the proximity to the school in which the child is enrolled at the time of placement;

(5) Services required to meet the child's needs and achieve permanency; and

(6) In addition, in the case of any child for whom another planned permanent living arrangement is the permanency plan, the court shall (A) inquire of the child about the desired permanency outcome for the child; (B) make a judicial determination explaining why, as of the date of the hearing, another planned permanent living arrangement is the best permanency plan for the child; and, (C) provide in the court order compelling reasons why it continues to not be in the best interest of the child to (i) return home, (ii) be placed for adoption, (iii) be placed with a legal guardian, or (iv) be placed with a fit and willing relative.

(f) The department shall annually report to the court the current status of the placements of children in the care, custody and control of the state department who have not been adopted.

(g) The department shall file a report with the court in any case where any child in the custody of the state receives more than three placements in one year no later than thirty days after the third placement. This report shall be provided to all parties and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. Upon motion by any party, the court shall review these placements and determine what efforts are necessary to provide the child with a permanent home. No report may be provided to any parent or parent's attorney whose parental rights have been terminated pursuant to this article.

(h) The department shall give actual notice, in writing, to the court, the child, the child's attorney, the parents and the parents' attorney at least forty-eight hours prior to the move if this is a planned move, or within forty-eight hours of the next business day after the move if the child is in imminent danger in the child's current placement, except where the notification would endanger the child or the foster family. A multidisciplinary treatment team shall convene as soon as practicable after notice to explore placement options. This requirement is not waived by placement of the child in a home or other residence maintained by a private provider. No notice may be provided pursuant to this provision to any parent or parent's attorney whose parental rights have been terminated pursuant to this article.

(i) Nothing in this article precludes any party from petitioning the court for review of the child's case at any time. The court shall grant the petition upon a showing that there is a change in circumstance or needs of the child that warrants court review.

(j) Any foster parent, preadoptive parent or relative providing care for the child shall be given notice of and the right to be heard at the permanency hearing provided in this section.

§ 49-4-609 Conviction for offenses against children.

In any case where a person is convicted of an offense against a child described in section twelve, article eight, chapter sixty-one of this code or articles eight-b or eight-d of that chapter and the person has custodial, visitation or other parental rights to the child who is the victim of the offense or to any child who resides in the same household as the victim, the court shall, at the time of sentencing, find that the person is an abusing parent within the meaning of this chapter as to the child victim, and may find that the person is an abusing parent as to any child who resides in the same household as the victim, and the court shall take further steps as are required by this article.

§ 49-4-610 Improvement periods in cases of child neglect or abuse; findings; orders; extensions; hearings; time limits.

In any proceeding brought pursuant to this article, the court may grant any respondent an improvement period in accord with this article. During the period, the court may require temporary custody with a responsible person which has been found to be a fit and proper person for the temporary custody of the child or children or the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting an improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with section four hundred eight, of this article. The types of improvement periods are as follows:

(1) Preadjudicatory improvement period. -- A court may grant a respondent an improvement period of a period not to exceed three months prior to making a finding that a child is abused or neglected pursuant to section six hundred one of this article only when:

(A) The respondent files a written motion requesting the improvement period;

(B) The respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period and the court further makes a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period;

(C) In the order granting the improvement period, the court:

(i) Orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within sixty days of the granting of the improvement period; or

(ii) Orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within ninety days of the granting of the improvement period and that the department submit a report as to the respondents progress in the improvement period within sixty days of the order granting the improvement period; and

(D) The order granting the improvement period requires the department to prepare and submit to the court an individualized family case plan in accordance with section four hundred eight of this article;

(2) Post-adjudicatory improvement period. -- After finding that a child is an abused or neglected child pursuant to section six hundred one of this article, a court may grant a respondent an improvement period of a period not to exceed six months when:

(A) The respondent files a written motion requesting the improvement period;

(B) The respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period and the court further makes a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period;

(C) In the order granting the improvement period, the court:

(i) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within thirty days of the granting of the improvement period; or

(ii) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within ninety days of the granting of the improvement period and that the department submit a report as to the respondent's progress in the improvement period within sixty days of the order granting the improvement period;

(D) Since the initiation of the proceeding, the respondent has not previously been granted any improvement period or the respondent demonstrates that since the initial improvement period, the respondent has experienced a substantial change in circumstances. Further, the respondent shall demonstrate that due to that change in circumstances the respondent is likely to fully participate in a further improvement period; and

(E) The order granting the improvement period requires the department to prepare and submit to the court an individualized family case plan in accordance with section four hundred eight of this article.

(3) Post-dispositional improvement period. -- The court may grant an improvement period not to exceed six months as a disposition pursuant to section six hundred four of this article when:

(A) The respondent moves in writing for the improvement period;

(B) The respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period and the court further makes a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period;

(C) In the order granting the improvement period, the court:

(i) Orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within sixty days of the granting of the improvement period; or

(ii) Orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within ninety days of the granting of the improvement period and that the department submit a report as to the respondent's progress in the improvement period within sixty days of the order granting the improvement period;

(D) Since the initiation of the proceeding, the respondent has not previously been granted any improvement period or the respondent demonstrates that since the initial improvement period, the respondent has experienced a substantial change in circumstances. Further, the respondent shall demonstrate that due to that change in circumstances, the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period; and

(E) The order granting the improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court an individualized family case plan in accordance with section four hundred eight of this article.

(4) Responsibilities of the respondent receiving improvement period. --

(A) When any improvement period is granted to a respondent pursuant to this section, the respondent shall be responsible for the initiation and completion of all terms of the improvement period. The court may order the state department to pay expenses associated with the services provided during the improvement period when the respondent has demonstrated that he or she is unable to bear the expenses.

(B) When any improvement period is granted to a respondent pursuant to this section, the respondent shall execute a release of all medical information regarding that respondent, including, but not limited to, information provided by mental health and substance abuse professionals and facilities. The release shall be accepted by a professional or facility regardless of whether the release conforms to any standard required by that facility.

(5) Responsibilities of the department during improvement period. -- When any respondent is granted an improvement period pursuant to this article, the department shall monitor the progress of the person in the improvement period. This section may not be construed to prohibit a court from ordering a respondent to participate in services designed to reunify a family or to relieve the department of any duty to make reasonable efforts to reunify a family required by state or federal law.

(6) Extension of improvement period. -- A court may extend any improvement period granted pursuant to subdivision (2) or (3) of this section for a period not to exceed three months when the court finds that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement period; that the continuation of the improvement period will not substantially impair the ability of the department to permanently place the child; and that the extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child.

(7) Termination of improvement period. -- Upon the motion by any party, the court shall terminate any improvement period granted pursuant to this section when the court finds that respondent has failed to fully participate in the terms of the improvement period or has satisfied the terms of the improvement period to correct any behavior alleged in the petition or amended petition to make his or her child unsafe.

(8) Hearings on improvement period. --

(A) Any hearing scheduled pursuant to this section may be continued only for good cause upon a written motion properly served on all parties. When a court grants a continuance, the court shall enter an order granting the continuance specifying a future date when the hearing will be held.

(B) Any hearing to be held at the end of an improvement period shall be held as nearly as practicable on successive days and shall be held as close in time as possible after the end of the improvement period and shall be held no later than thirty days of the termination of the improvement period.

(9) Time limit for improvement periods. -- Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, no combination of any improvement periods or extensions thereto may cause a child to be in foster care more than fifteen months of the most recent twenty-two months, unless the court finds compelling circumstances by clear and convincing evidence that it is in the child's best interests to extend the time limits contained in this paragraph.

PART VIII. SUPPORT AND SUPPORT ORDERS.

§ 49-4-801 Support of a child removed from home pursuant to this chapter; order requirements.

(a) It is the intent of the Legislature that to the extent practicable, this article should encourage and require a child's parents to meet the obligation of providing that child with adequate food, shelter, clothing, education, and health and child care.

(b) This article shall be construed to be consistent with articles one, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, eighteen, nineteen and twenty four of chapter forty-eight of this code, and those articles apply to actions pursuant to this chapter unless expressly stated otherwise.

(c) When a child is removed from his or her home pursuant to this chapter, the court shall issue a support order payable by the child's mother. If the child's legal father has been determined, the court shall issue a child support order payable by the legal father. If no legal father has been determined, the court shall issue an order establishing paternity prior to or simultaneously with establishing a support order payable by the child's legal father. Copies of the orders shall be provided to the Department of Health and Human Resources, Bureau of Child Support Enforcement.

(d) The order establishing a child support obligation must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards that are set forth in article thirteen, chapter forty-eight of this code.

(e) In addition to the reasons for deviation listed in section seven hundred two, article thirteen, chapter forty-eight of this code, deviation from the child support guidelines is appropriate when the court finds that:

(1) It may assist the parent in successful completion of an improvement period;

(2) It may be in the best interest of the minor child to issue a zero child support order; and/or

(3) The parent temporarily or permanently has no gross income as defined in section two hundred twenty eight, article one, chapter forty-eight of this code.

§ 49-4-802 General provisions for support orders; contempt.

(a) Any pre-existing support order from any other court or administrative agency with authority to issue a support order shall remain in full force and effect until a superseding order is issued.

(b) If a child is returned to the physical custody of a parent, that parent is not responsible for paying child support for the duration of time that parent has physical custody of the child without the necessity of entry of another court order terminating that parent's child support obligation.

(c) If the action is dismissed for failure to prove the allegations of abuse or neglect, any support provision issued pursuant to this chapter are void ab initio. Any adjudication of paternity shall remain in full force and effect.

(d) The support obligation shall automatically continue beyond the termination of the payor's parental rights, unless the support obligation is explicitly ended in an order.

§ 49-4-803 Enforcement of support orders.

(a) Support orders may be enforced through any manner provided in chapters thirty-eight and forty-eight of this code.

(b) An action for contempt for nonpayment of support may be brought by the Department of Health and Human Resources, Bureau for Children and Families or Bureau for Child Support Enforcement; the child's physical custodian; the child's guardian ad litem; or the prosecuting attorney.

ARTICLE 7. INTERSTATE COOPERATION.

PART I. INTERSTATE COMPACT ON THE PLACEMENT OF CHILDREN.

§ 49-7-101 Adoption of compact.

The interstate compact on the placement of children is hereby enacted into law and entered into with all other jurisdictions legally joining therein in form substantially as follows:

ARTICLE I. PURPOSE AND POLICY.

It is the purpose and policy of the party states to cooperate with each other in the interstate placement of children to the end that:

(a) Each child requiring placement shall receive the maximum opportunity to be placed in a suitable environment and with persons or institutions having appropriate qualifications and facilities to provide a necessary and desirable degree and type of care.

(b) The appropriate authorities in a state where a child is to be placed may have full opportunity to ascertain the circumstances of the proposed placement, thereby promoting full compliance with applicable requirements for the protection of the child.

(c) The proper authorities of the state from which the placement is made may obtain the most complete information on the basis of which to evaluate a projected placement before it is made.

(d) Appropriate jurisdictional arrangements for the care of children will be promoted.

ARTICLE II. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this compact:

(a) "Child" means a person who, by reason of minority is legally subject to parental, guardianship or similar control.

(b) "Sending agency" means a party state, officer or employee thereof; a subdivision of a party state, or officer or employee thereof; a court of a party state; a person, corporation, association, charitable agency or other entity which sends, brings, or causes to be sent or brought any child to another party state.

(c) "Receiving state" means the state to which a child is sent, brought, or caused to be sent or brought, whether by public authorities or private persons or agencies, and whether for placement with state or local public authorities or for placement with private agencies or persons.

(d) "Placement" means the arrangement for the care of a child in a family free home or boarding home or in a child-caring agency or institution but does not include any institution caring for the mentally ill, mentally defective or epileptic or any institution primarily educational in character, and any hospital or other medical facility.

ARTICLE III. CONDITIONS FOR REPLACEMENT.

(a) No sending agency shall send, bring, or cause to be sent or brought into any other party state any child for placement in foster care or as a preliminary to a possible adoption unless the sending agency shall comply with each and every requirement set forth in this article and with the applicable laws of the receiving state governing the placement of children therein.

(b) Prior to sending, bringing or causing any child to be sent or brought into a receiving state for placement in foster care or as a preliminary to a possible adoption, the sending agency shall furnish the appropriate public authorities in the receiving state written notice of the intention to send, bring, or place the child in the receiving state. The notice shall contain:

(1) The name, date and place of birth of the child.

(2) The identity and address or addresses of the parents or legal guardian.

(3) The name and address of the person, agency or institution to or with which the sending agency proposes to send, bring, or place the child.

(4) A full statement of the reasons for the proposed action and evidence of the authority pursuant to which the placement is proposed to be made.

(c) Any public officer or agency in a receiving state which is in receipt of a notice pursuant to paragraph (b) of this article may request of the sending agency, or any other appropriate officer or agency of or in the sending agency's state, and shall be entitled to receive therefrom, the supporting or additional information as it may deem necessary under the circumstances to carry out the purpose and policy of this compact.

(d) The child shall not be sent, brought, or caused to be sent or brought into the receiving state until the appropriate public authorities in the receiving state shall notify the sending agency, in writing, to the effect that the proposed placement does not appear to be contrary to the interests of the child.

ARTICLE IV. PENALTY FOR ILLEGAL REPLACEMENT.

The sending, bringing, or causing to be sent or brought into any receiving state of a child in violation of the terms of this compact shall constitute a violation of the laws respecting the placement of children of both the state in which the sending agency is located or from which it sends or brings the child and of the receiving state. A violation may be punished or subjected to penalty in either jurisdiction in accordance with its laws. In addition to liability for any punishment or penalty, a violation shall constitute full and sufficient grounds for the suspension or revocation of any license, permit, or other legal authorization held by the sending agency which empowers or allows it to place, or care for children.

ARTICLE V. RETENTION OF JURISDICTION.

(a) The sending agency shall retain jurisdiction over the child sufficient to determine all matters in relation to the custody, supervision, care, treatment and disposition of the child which it would have had if the child had remained in the sending agency's state, until the child is adopted, reaches majority, becomes self-supporting or is discharged with the concurrence of the appropriate authority in the receiving state. The jurisdiction shall also include the power to effect or cause the return of the child or its transfer to another location and custody pursuant to law. The sending agency shall continue to have financial responsibility for support and maintenance of the child during the period of the placement. Nothing contained herein shall defeat a claim of jurisdiction by a receiving state sufficient to deal with an act of delinquency or crime committed therein.

(b) When the sending agency is a public agency, it may enter into an agreement with an authorized public or private agency in the receiving state providing for the performance of one or more services in respect of the case by the latter as agent for the sending agency.

(c) Nothing in this compact shall be construed to prevent a private charitable agency authorized to place children in the receiving state from performing services or acting as agent in that state for a private charitable agency of the sending state; nor to prevent the agency in the receiving state from discharging financial responsibility for the support and maintenance of a child who has been placed on behalf of the sending agency without relieving the responsibility set forth in paragraph (a) hereof.

ARTICLE VI. INSTITUTIONAL CARE OF DELINQUENT CHILDREN.

A child adjudicated delinquent may be placed in an institution in another party jurisdiction pursuant to this compact but no placement shall be made unless the child is given a court hearing on notice to the parent or guardian with opportunity to be heard, prior to his or her being sent to the other party jurisdiction for institutional care and the court finds that:

1. Equivalent facilities for the child are not available in the sending agency's jurisdiction; and

2. Institutional care in the other jurisdiction is in the best interest of the child and will not produce undue hardship.

ARTICLE VII. COMPACT ADMINISTRATOR.

The executive head of each jurisdiction party to this compact shall designate an officer who shall be general coordinator of activities under this compact in his or her jurisdiction and who, acting jointly with like officers of other party jurisdictions, shall have power to promulgate rules and regulations to carry out more effectively the terms and provisions of this compact.

ARTICLE VIII. LIMITATIONS.

This compact shall not apply to:

(a) The sending or bringing of a child into a receiving state by his or her parent, stepparent, grandparent, adult brother or sister, adult uncle or aunt, or his or her guardian and leaving the child with a relative or nonagency guardian in the receiving state.

(b) Any placement, sending or bringing of a child into a receiving state pursuant to any other interstate compact to which both the state from which the child is sent or brought and the receiving state are party, or to any other agreement between the states which has the force of law.

ARTICLE IX. ENACTMENT AND WITHDRAWAL.

This compact shall be open to joinder by any state, territory or possession of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and, with the consent of Congress, the government of Canada or any province thereof. It shall become effective with respect to those jurisdictions when that other jurisdiction has enacted the same into law. Withdrawal from this compact shall be by the enactment of a statute repealing the same, but shall not take effect until two years after the effective date of the statute and until written notice of the withdrawal has been given by the withdrawing state to the Governor of each other party jurisdiction. Withdrawal of a party state shall not affect the rights, duties and obligations under this compact of any sending agency therein with respect to a placement made prior to the effective date of withdrawal.

ARTICLE X. CONSTRUCTION.

The provisions of this compact shall be liberally construed to effectuate the purposes thereof. The provisions of this compact shall be severable and if any phrase, clause, sentence or provision of this compact is declared to be contrary to the Constitution of any party state or of the United States or the applicability thereof to any government, agency, person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of this compact and the applicability thereof to any government, agency, person or circumstance shall not be affected thereby. If this compact shall be held contrary to the Constitution of any state party thereto, the compact shall remain in full force and effect as to the remaining states and in full force and effect as to the state affected as to all severable matters.

§ 49-7-102 Definitions; implementation.

(a) Financial responsibility for any child placed pursuant to the provisions of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of Article V thereof in the first instance. However, in the event of partial or complete default of performance thereunder, section one hundred one, article two of this chapter may be invoked.

(b) The "appropriate public authorities" as used in Article III of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children shall, with reference to this state, mean the Department of Health and Human Resources and the agency shall receive and act with reference to notices required by Article III.

(c) As used in paragraph (a) of Article V of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children, the phrase "appropriate authority in the receiving state" with reference to this state shall mean the Department of Health and Human Resources.

(d) The officers and agencies of this state and its subdivisions having authority to place children are hereby empowered to enter into agreements with appropriate officers or agencies of or in other party states pursuant to paragraph (b) of Article V of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children. An agreement which contains a financial commitment or imposes a financial obligation on this state or subdivision or agency thereof is not binding unless it has the approval in writing of the Auditor in the case of the state and of the chief local fiscal officer in the case of a subdivision of the state.

(e) Any requirements for visitation, inspection or supervision of children, homes, institutions or other agencies in another party state which may apply under sections one hundred eight and one hundred eleven, article two of this chapter shall be deemed to be met if performed pursuant to an agreement entered into by appropriate officers or agencies of this state or a subdivision thereof as contemplated by paragraph (b) of Article V of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children.

(f) Section one hundred nine, article two of this chapter does not apply to placements made pursuant to the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children.

(g) Any court having jurisdiction to place delinquent children may place a child in an institution of or in another state pursuant to Article VI of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children and shall retain jurisdiction as provided in Article V thereof.

(h) As used in Article VII of the interstate compact on the placement of children, the term "executive head" means the Governor. The Governor is hereby authorized to appoint a compact administrator in accordance with the terms of that Article VII.

PART II. INTERSTATE ADOPTION ASSISTANCE COMPACT.

§ 49-7-201 Interstate adoption assistance compact; findings and purpose.

(a) The Legislature finds that:

(1) Finding adoptive families for children, for whom state assistance is desirable pursuant to section one hundred twelve, article four, of this chapter and assuring the protection of the interests of the children affected during the entire assistance period, require special measures when the adoptive parents move to other states or are residents of another state; and

(2) Provision of medical and other necessary services for children, with state assistance, encounters special difficulties when the provision of services takes place in other states.

(b) The purposes of sections two hundred one through two hundred four of this article are to:

(1) Authorize the Department of Health and Human Resources to enter into interstate agreements with agencies of other states for the protection of children on behalf of whom adoption assistance is being provided by the Department of Health and Human Resources; and

(2) Provide procedures for interstate children's adoption assistance payments, including medical payments.

§ 49-7-202 Interstate adoption assistance compacts authorized; definitions.

(a) The Department of Health and Human Resources is authorized to develop, participate in the development of, negotiate and enter into one or more interstate compacts on behalf of this state with other states to implement one or more of the purposes set forth in sections two hundred one through two hundred four of this article. When so entered into, and for so long as it shall remain in force, the compact shall have the force and effect of law.

(b) For the purposes of sections two hundred one through two hundred four of this article, the term "state" means a state of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, or a Territory or Possession of or administered by the United States.

(c) For the purposes of sections two hundred one through two hundred four of this article, the term "adoption assistance state" means the state that is signatory to an adoption assistance agreement in a particular case.

(d) For the purposes of sections two hundred one through two hundred four of this article, the term "residence state" means the state of which the child is a resident by virtue of the residence of the adoptive parents.

§ 49-7-203 Interstate adoption assistance compact; contents of compact.

A compact entered into pursuant to the authority conferred by sections two hundred one through two hundred four of this article shall have the following content:

(1) A provision making it available to joinder by all states.

(2) A provision or provisions for withdrawal from the compact upon written notice to the parties, but with a period of one year between the date of the notice and the effective date of the withdrawal.

(3) A requirement that the protections afforded by or pursuant to the compact continue in force for the duration of the adoption assistance and be applicable to all children and their adoptive parents who on the effective date of the withdrawal are receiving adoption assistance from a party state other than the one in which they are resident and have their principal place of abode.

(4) A requirement that each instance of adoption assistance to which the compact applies be covered by an adoption assistance agreement in writing between the adoptive parents and the state department which undertakes to provide the adoption assistance, and further, that the agreement be expressly for the benefit of the adopted child and enforceable by the adoptive parents, and the state agency providing the adoption assistance.

(5) Other provisions as may be appropriate to implement the proper administration of the compact.

§ 49-7-204 Medical assistance for children with special needs; rule-making; penalties.

(a) A child with special needs resident in this state who is the subject of an adoption assistance agreement with another state shall be entitled to receive a medical assistance identification from this state upon the filing in the Division of Human Services of a certified copy of the adoption assistance agreement obtained from the adoption assistance state. In accordance with regulations of the Department of Health and Human Resources the adoptive parents shall be required at least annually to show that the agreement is still in force or has been renewed.

(b) The Department of Health and Human Resources shall consider the holder of a medical assistance identification pursuant to this section as any other holder of a medical assistance identification under the laws of this state and shall process and make payment on claims on account of the holder in the same manner and pursuant to the same conditions and procedures as for other recipients of medical assistance.

(c) The Department of Health and Human Resources shall provide coverage and benefits for a child who is in another state and who is covered by an adoption assistance agreement made by the Department of Health and Human Resources for the coverage or benefits, if any, not provided by the residence state. To this end, the adoptive parents acting for the child may submit evidence of payment for services or benefit amounts not payable in the residence state and shall be reimbursed therefor. However, there may be no reimbursement for services or benefit amounts covered under any insurance or other third party medical contract or arrangement held by the child or the adoptive parents. The Department of Health and Human Resources shall propose rules in accordance with article three, chapter twenty-nine-a of this code that are necessary to effectuate the requirements and purposes of this section. The additional coverages and benefit amounts provided pursuant to this section shall be for services to the cost of which there is no federal contribution, or which, if federally aided, are not provided by the residence state. Among other things, the regulations shall include procedures to be followed in obtaining prior approvals for services in those instances where required for the assistance.

(d) Any person who submits a claim for payment or reimbursement for services or benefits pursuant to this section or the making of any statement in connection therewith, which claim of statement the maker knows or should know to be false, misleading or fraudulent is guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or incarcerated in a correctional facility not more than two years, or both fined and incarcerated.

(e) This section applies only to medical assistance for children under adoption assistance agreements from states that have entered into a compact with this state under which the other state provides medical assistance to children with special needs under adoption assistance agreements made by this state. All other children entitled to medical assistance pursuant to adoption assistance agreements entered into by this state shall be eligible to receive it in accordance with the laws and procedures applicable thereto.

CHAPTER 7:
RULES OF PROCEDURE FOR CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT PROCEEDINGS

APPENDIX A: Guidelines for Children's Guardians 40

APPENDIX B: Report of Guardian Ad Litem 44

Rule 1. Scope of child abuse and neglect rules.

These rules set forth procedures for circuit courts in child abuse and neglect proceedings instituted pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-601, et seq. If these rules conflict with other rules or statutes, these rules shall apply.

Rule 2. Purposes of child abuse and neglect rules; construction and enforcement.

These rules shall be liberally construed to achieve safe, stable, secure permanent homes for abused and/or neglected children and fairness to all litigants. These rules are not to be applied or enforced in any manner which will endanger or harm a child. These rules are designed to accomplish the following purposes:

(a) To provide fair, timely and efficient disposition of cases involving suspected child abuse or neglect;

(b) To provide for judicial oversight of case planning;

(c) To ensure a coordinated decision-making process;

(d) To reduce unnecessary delays in court proceedings through strengthened court case management; and

(e) To encourage the involvement of all parties, including children, in the litigation as well as the involvement of all community agencies and resource personnel providing services to any party.

Rule 3. Definitions.

As used in these rules, these terms are defined as follows:

(a) "Adjudicatory hearing" shall mean the hearing contemplated by W. Va. Code § 49-4-601 to determine whether a child has been abused and/or neglected as alleged in the petition;

(b) "CASA" shall mean Court-Appointed Special Advocate as set forth in Rule 52;

(c) "Child's case plan" shall mean the plan prepared by the Department pursuant to W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-408 and 49-4-604 following an adjudication by the court that the child is an abused and/or neglected child;

(d) "Civil petition" shall mean the petition instituting child abuse and/or neglect proceedings under W. Va. Code § 49-4-601;

(e) "Child abuse and neglect proceedings" shall mean proceedings instituted by the filing of a civil petition under W. Va. Code § 49-4-601;

(f) "Department" shall mean the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources and any subdivision or any successor or assignee designated by law carrying out the statutory functions of the Department or agency thereof involved in the investigation, adjudication, or dispositional aspects of child abuse and/or neglect proceedings under W. Va. Code § 49-4-601, et seq.;

(g) "Preliminary hearing" shall mean the hearing contemplated by W.Va. Code § 49-4-602 that is held within ten days of service of the petition when the court finds that the petition alleges facts demonstrating the existence of imminent danger to the child, whether or not the court has ordered immediate transfer of custody of the child to the Department or a responsible person. The hearing is held for the purpose of determining (1) whether there is reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger; (2) whether continuation in the home is contrary to the welfare of the child, setting forth the reasons; (3) whether the Department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and to prevent the child's removal from his or her home or whether an emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; (4) whether efforts should be made by the Department to facilitate the child's return, and if so, what efforts should be made; and (5) whether the child's school placement is in his or her school of origin, and if not, whether the change of school placement is in the child's best interests.

(h) "Permanency hearing" shall mean the hearing contemplated by W.Va. Code § 49-4-608 to determine the permanency plan for the child. The hearing shall be conducted in accordance with Rule 36a;

(i) "Disposition hearing" shall mean the hearing contemplated by W. Va. Code § 49-4-604 that is held after a child has been adjudged to be abused and/or neglected, at which the court reviews the child and family case plan filed by the Department and determines the appropriate disposition of the case and permanency plan for the family;

(j) "Family case plan" shall mean the plan prepared by the Department pursuant to W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-408 and 49-4-604 following the grant of an improvement period;

(k) "Guardian ad Litem" means the attorney appointed to represent a child or children as set forth in Rule 18a of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings;

(l) "Parent" or "parents" means an individual defined as a parent by law or on the basis of a biological relationship, marriage to a person with a biological relationship, legal adoption or other recognized grounds, pursuant to W. Va. Cod § 49-1-204;

(m) "Parties" means the petitioner, co-petitioner, respondent, adjudicated battered parent, and child;

(n) "Permanent placement" of a child shall mean:

(1) The petition has been dismissed and the child has been returned to the home or to a relative with no custodial supervision by the Department;

(2) The child has been placed in the permanent custody of a non-abusive parent; or

(3) A permanent out-of-home placement of the child has been achieved following entry of a final disposition order. A permanent out-of-home placement has been achieved only when the child has been adopted, placed in a legal guardianship, placed in another planned permanent living arrangement (APPLA), or emancipated; and

(o) "Persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard" are persons other than parties who include the CASA when appointed, foster parents, preadoptive parents, or custodial relatives providing care for the child.

Rule 3a. Pre-Petition Investigations.

(a) Administrative Order Regarding Investigation. Upon receiving a written referral from a family court pursuant to Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Courts, a circuit court shall forthwith cause to be entered and served an administrative order in the name of and regarding the affected child or children directing the Department to submit to the court an investigation report or appear before the court in not more than 45 days, at a scheduled hearing, to show cause why the Department's investigation report has not been submitted to the circuit court and referring family court. If a circuit court, based upon a review of the written referral from family court, determines that the allegations or other information present reason to believe a child may be in imminent danger, the circuit court may shorten the time for the Department to act upon the referral and appear before the circuit court. The scheduled hearing may be mooted by the Department's earlier submission of the investigation report or, in the alternative, the filing of an abuse and neglect petition under Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code relating to the matters which were the subject of the family court referral and circuit court administrative order. The duties of the Department under this rule shall be in addition to the Department's obligations pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-2-804 regarding notification of disposition to persons mandated to report suspected child abuse and neglect.

(b) Mandamus Relief. Following review of an investigation report in which the Department concludes that a civil petition is unnecessary, if the circuit court believes that the information in the family court's written referral and the Department's investigation report, considered together, suggest circumstances upon which the Department would have a duty to file a civil petition, the court shall treat the written referral as a petition for a writ of mandamus in the name of and regarding the affected child or children. A show-cause order shall issue by the court setting a prompt hearing to determine whether the respondent Department has a duty to file a civil petition under the particular circumstances set forth in the written referral and investigation report. If it is determined by the court that the Department has a nondiscretionary duty pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-605 to file a petition seeking to terminate parental rights, the Department shall be directed by writ to file such petition within a time period set by the court. If it is determined that the circumstances bring the filing decision within the Department's discretionary authority, no such writ shall issue unless the court specifically finds aggravated circumstances, consistent with the meaning and usage of that term in W. Va. Code § 49-4-602(d)(1), and that the Department acted arbitrarily and capriciously in the exercise of its discretion.

(c) Service and Notice. Orders and other documents issued pursuant to this rule shall be served on the Department by mail or facsimile transmission directed to the Department's local child protective services office. Copies of such orders shall also be delivered to the prosecuting attorney.

(d) Confidentiality. All orders and other documents pertaining to matters arising under this rule, and docket entries regarding the same, shall be treated as confidential records concerning a child consistent with W. Va. Code § 49-5-101; and any hearings conducted pursuant to this rule may be attended by those persons provided notice under subsection (c) above, but shall be closed to the general public except that persons whom the circuit court determines have a legitimate interest in the proceedings may attend. If the case in family court that gave rise to the referral to the Department was a domestic violence proceeding, staff from any involved licensed family protection program is entitled access to circuit court proceedings under this rule to the same extent such access is afforded under statutes and rules pertaining to domestic violence proceedings.

(e) Transfer of Administrative Proceedings. Within 10 days following service of an administrative order issued by a circuit court pursuant to subdivision (a), the Department may file a motion with the issuing court seeking transfer of the administrative proceedings to the circuit court of another county based upon reasons relating to a more appropriate venue for the administrative proceedings and any abuse and neglect case which may result from such proceedings. Unless the court finds the basis for the motion to be clearly unreasonable under the particular circumstances presented, the administrative proceedings shall be transferred as requested. If the administrative proceedings are transferred, the Department's obligations pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-2-804 and Rule 48(c) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court regarding the investigation and providing a copy of any investigative report remain applicable to the referring family court. The circuit clerk shall send certified copies of the order granting or denying the transfer motion to the referring family court and the prosecuting attorney. If the order grants the motion, certified copies shall also be sent to the circuit court and prosecuting attorney in the county where the administrative proceeding is transferred.

Rule 4. Transfer and consolidation.

A circuit court before which a civil petition is filed pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-601, et seq., may order any other proceeding pending before another circuit court, family court, or magistrate court which arises out of the same facts alleged in the civil petition or involves the question of whether such abuse and neglect occurred transferred to the court where the civil petition is pending and may consolidate such proceedings, except criminal and delinquency proceedings, all in accordance with Rule 42 of the Rules of Civil Procedure and W. Va. Code § 56-9-1.

Rule 4a. Venue.

Pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-4-601(a), the Department or a reputable person may file a petition to initiate a child abuse and neglect proceeding in the circuit court in the county where the child resides. If the Department is a petitioner, the petition may also be filed where the alleged abuse and/or neglect occurred, where the custodial respondent or one of the other respondents resides, or to the judge of the court in vacation. Under no circumstances may a party file a petition in more than one county based on the same set of facts.

Rule 5. Contemporaneous civil, criminal, and other proceedings.

Under no circumstances shall a child abuse and neglect proceeding be delayed pending the initiation, investigation, prosecution, or resolution of any other proceeding, including, but not limited to, criminal proceedings.

Rule 6. Maintaining case on court docket.

Each child abuse and neglect proceeding shall be maintained on the circuit court's docket until permanent placement of the child has been achieved. The court retains exclusive jurisdiction over placement of the child while the case is pending, as well as over any subsequent requests for modification, including, but not limited to, changes in permanent placement or visitation, except that (1) if the petition is dismissed for failure to state a claim under Chapter 49 of the W. Va. Code, or (2) if the petition is dismissed, and the child is thereby ordered placed in the legal and physical custody of both of his/her cohabitating parents without any visitation or child support provisions, then any future child custody, visitation, and/or child support proceedings between the parents may be brought in family court. However, should allegations of child abuse and/or neglect arise in the family court proceedings, then the matter shall proceed in compliance with Rule 3a.

Rule 6a. Confidentiality of Proceedings and Records; Access by Family Court.

(a) Hearings and Reviews. Attendance at all proceedings brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-601, et seq. shall be limited to the parties, counsel, persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, witnesses while testifying, multidisciplinary treatment team members, and other persons whom the circuit court determines have a legitimate interest in the proceedings.

(b) Court Records. All records and information maintained by the courts in child abuse and neglect proceedings shall be kept confidential except as otherwise provided in W. Va. Code, Chapter 49 and this rule. In the interest of assuring that any determination made in proceedings before a family court arising under W. Va. Code, Chapter 48, or W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, does not contravene any determination made by a circuit court in a related prior or pending child abuse and neglect case arising under W. Va. Code, Chapter 49, family courts and staff shall have access to all circuit court orders and case indexes in this State in all such related Chapter 49 proceedings.

Rule 7. Time computation; extensions of time and continuances.

Time frames prescribed in these rules shall be computed in accord with Rule 6(a) of the W.Va. Rules of Civil Procedure.

Except as provided for in Rule 5, extensions of time and continuances beyond the times specified in these rules or by other applicable law shall be granted only for good cause, regardless of whether the parties are in agreement. If a continuance is granted in accordance with this rule, the court shall set forth in a written order its reasons for finding good cause.

Rule 8. Testimony of children; inclusion of children in hearings and multidisciplinary treatment team meetings.

(a) Restrictions on the testimony of children. Notwithstanding any limitation on the ability to testify imposed by this rule, all children remain competent to testify in any proceeding before the court as determined by the Rules of Evidence and the Rules of Civil Procedure. However, there shall be a rebuttable presumption that the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony and the court shall exclude this testimony if the potential psychological harm to the child outweighs the necessity of the child's testimony. Further, the court may exclude the child's testimony if (A) the equivalent evidence can be procured through other reasonable efforts; (B) the child's testimony is not more probative on the issue than the other forms of evidence presented; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interest of justice will best be served by the exclusion of the child's testimony.

(b) Procedure for taking testimony from children. The court may conduct in camera interviews of a minor child, outside the presence of the parent(s). The parties' attorneys shall be allowed to attend such interviews, except when the court determines that the presence of attorneys will be especially intimidating to the child witness. When attorneys are not allowed to be present for in camera interviews of a child, the court shall, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, have the interview electronically or stenographically recorded and make the recording available to the attorneys before the evidentiary hearing resumes. Under exceptional circumstances, the court may elect not to make the recording available to the attorneys but must place the basis for a finding of exceptional circumstances on the record. Under these exceptional circumstances, the recording only will be available for review by the Supreme Court of Appeals. When attorneys are present for an in camera interview of a child, the court may, before the interview, require the attorneys to submit questions for the court to ask the child witness rather than allow the attorneys to question the child directly, and the court may require the attorney to sit in an unobtrusive manner during the in camera interview. Whether or not the parties' attorneys are permitted to attend the in camera interview, they may submit interview questions and/or topics for consideration by the court.

(c) Sealing of child's testimony. If an interview was recorded and disclosed to the attorneys, the record of the child's testimony thereafter shall be sealed and shall not be opened unless:

(1) Ordered by the court for good cause shown; or

(2) For purposes of appeal.

(d) A child subject to a case may attend all or portions of hearings, unless the court deems such attendance inappropriate, and may attend all or portions of multidisciplinary treatment team meetings, unless the multidisciplinary treatment team deems such participation inappropriate. Consideration shall be given to the child's preferences and developmental maturity.

Rule 9. Use of closed circuit television testimony.

(a) In any case governed by these rules in which a child eleven (11) years old or less is to be a witness, the court, upon order of its own or upon motion of a party, may permit the child witness to testify through live, one-way, closed-circuit television whereby there shall be no transmission into the room from which the child witness is testifying.

(b) In any case in which a child over the age of eleven (11) years is to be a witness, the court, upon order of its own or upon motion of a party, and upon a finding of good cause, shall permit the child witness to testify through live, one-way, closed-circuit television whereby there shall be no transmission into the room from which the child witness is testifying.

(c) The testimony of the child witness shall be taken in any room, separate and apart from the courtroom, from which testimony of the child witness can be transmitted to the courtroom by means of live, one-way, closed-circuit television. The testimony shall be deemed as given in open court.

(d) The judge, the attorneys for the parties, and any other person the court permits for the purpose of providing support for the child in order to promote the ability of the child to testify shall be present in the testimonial room at all times during the testimony of the child witness. The judge may permit liberal consultation between counsel and the parties by adjournment, electronic means, or otherwise.

(e) The image and voice of the child witness, as well as the image of all other persons present in the testimony room, other than the operator, shall be transmitted live by means of live, one-way, closed-circuit television in the courtroom. The courtroom shall be equipped with monitors sufficient to permit the parties to observe the demeanor of the child witness during his or her testimony.

(f) The operator shall place herself or himself and the closed-circuit television equipment in a position that permits the entire testimony of the child witness to be transmitted to the courtroom.

(g) The child witness shall testify under oath, and the examination and cross-examination of the child witness shall, in all other respects, be conducted in the same manner as if the child witness testified in the courtroom.

(h) When the testimony of the child witness is transmitted from the testimonial room into the courtroom, the court stenographer shall record the testimony in the same manner as if the child witness testified in the courtroom.

(i) Under all circumstances, the image of the child witness transmitted shall include the entirety of his or her person ordinarily subject to observation by the human eye, subject to such limitations as may be unavoidable by reason of standard courtroom furnishings.

(j) Should it be required, for the purposes of identification that the person to be identified and the child witness be present in the courtroom at the same time, the court shall ensure that this meeting takes place after the child witness has completed his or her testimony; and this confrontation shall, to the extent possible, be accomplished in a manner that is nonthreatening to the child witness.

Rule 10. Discovery.

(a) The attorney for the child shall have access to the file kept by the Department and the file kept by the attorney for the petitioner, including all information set forth in

W. Va. Code § 49-5-101 and the attorney may make such use thereof as may be appropriate to the case, subject to such limitations as the order of the court shall require;

(b) Unless otherwise ordered by the court pursuant to Rule 12, within three (3) days of the filing of the petition, the attorney for the petitioner shall provide to counsel for the respondent(s) or to the respondent(s) personally, if not represented by counsel, the attorney for the child, and all other persons entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard, the following information, as is within the possession, custody, or control of the attorney for the petitioner, the existence of which is known, or by some exercise of due diligence may become known, to the attorney for the petitioner:

(1) Any relevant written or recorded statements made by the respondents (or any one of them), or copies thereof, and the substance of any oral statements which the petitioner intends to offer in evidence at the trial made by the respondents (or any one of them);

(2) Copies of the respondent's prior criminal records, if any;

(3) Copies of books, papers, documents, photographs, tangible objects, buildings, or places which are material to the preparation of the respondent's case or are intended for use by the attorney for the petitioner as evidence in chief at the trial or were obtained from or belonging to the respondent;

(4) Copies of results or reports of physical and/or mental examinations, if any, and copies of scientific tests and/or experiments, if any, which are material to the preparation of the respondent's case or are intended for use by the attorney for the petitioner as evidence in chief at the trial; and

(5) A written list of names and addresses of all witnesses whom the attorney for the petitioner intends to call in the presentation of the case-in-chief, together with any record of prior convictions of any such witnesses;

(c) Not less than five (5) days prior to any hearing wherein the respondent intends to introduce evidence, the respondent shall provide to the attorney for the petitioner, the attorney for the child, and all other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, the following information:

(1) Copies of books, papers, documents, photographs, tangible objects, buildings, or places which are within the possession, custody, or control of the respondent and which the respondent intends to introduce as evidence in chief at the trial;

(2) Copies of any results and reports of physical and/or mental examinations, if any, and copies of scientific tests and/or experiments, if any, made in connection with the particular case, if any of such copies are within the possession or control of the respondent, which the respondent intends to introduce as evidence in chief at the trial or which were prepared by a witness whom the respondent intends to call at the trial when the results and/or reports relate to his or her testimony; and

(3) A written list of the names and addresses of the witnesses the respondent intends to call in the presentation of the case-in-chief.

(d) The disclosure provided for in this rule is not intended to limit the amount or nature of disclosure in these cases. This rule merely establishes the minimum amount of disclosure required.

(e) If, prior to or during any hearing, a party discovers additional evidence or material that should have been disclosed, that party shall promptly notify all other parties and their counsel, persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, and the court of the existence of the additional evidence or material.

Rule 11. Motion to compel, limit, or deny discovery.

(a) Any party receiving a written request to make information, documents, records, or evidence available for inspection, testing, copying, or photographing shall, within two (2) days, excluding weekends and holidays, comply with the request or provide a written explanation of the reasons for noncompliance to the parties and the court;

(b) A party whose request for discovery is not fully complied with may file a motion for an order compelling discovery. A motion to compel discovery shall set forth the request for discovery, describe why the items or information sought are discoverable, and specify how the request was not in compliance;

(c) A party receiving a discovery request may file a motion to deny discovery or permit a limited response. The motion shall set forth the request for discovery and set forth reasons why the discovery should be denied or the response should be permitted to be limited or subject to conditions; and

(d) The court shall hear and rule on a discovery motion within seven (7) days after it is filed. Among other things, the court may:

(1) Grant the requested discovery and specify the time within which it must be provided;

(2) Order reciprocal discovery;

(3) Order appropriate sanctions for any clear misuse of discovery or arbitrary delay or refusal to comply with a discovery request; and

(4) Deny, limit, or set conditions on the requested discovery.

Rule 12. Judicial management of discovery.

(a) Upon its own motion or upon the request of a party, the court may limit discovery methods and specify its overall timing and sequence provided that each party shall be allowed a reasonable opportunity to obtain information needed for the preparation of his or her case.

(b) Any party moving for a continuance on the ground that discovery is likely to delay a hearing set by the court shall promptly send written notice to the court stating the need for the discovery and the extent of the likely delay.

Rule 13. Preservation of records and exhibits.

The proceedings shall be recorded and transcripts produced according to the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(k). Exhibits admitted into evidence shall be retained by the court for two (2) years or until dismissal of the proceedings from the court's docket, whichever occurs later, unless preservation of the exhibit is impractical or the parties agree that it is no longer necessary.

Rule 14. Telephone or video conferences.

The court may hear motions and conduct conferences relating to discovery, service of process, or case scheduling by telephone or video conference call. By agreement of the parties or motion filed in accord with Rule 17(c), the court may hear testimony by telephone or video conference call.

Rule 15. Visitation and other communication with child.

If at any time the court orders a child removed from the custody of his or her parent(s) and placed in the custody of the Department or of some other responsible person, the court may make such provision for reasonable visitation, telephone or video calls, letters, email, or other communication as is consistent with the child's well-being and best interests. The court shall assure that any supervised visitation shall occur in surroundings and in a safe place, dignified, and suitable for visitation, taking into account the child's age and condition. The person requesting visitation shall set forth his or her relationship to the child and the degree of personal contact previously existing with the child. In determining the appropriateness of granting visitation rights to the person seeking visitation, the court shall consider whether or not the granting of visitation would interfere with the child's case plan and the overall effect granting or denying visitation will have on the child's best interests. The visitation order of the circuit court shall be enforceable upon entry unless a stay of execution of said order is issued by the circuit court or the Supreme Court of Appeals. The effect of entry of an order of termination of parental rights shall be, inter alia, to prohibit all contact and visitation between the child who is the subject of the petition and the parent who is the subject of the order and the respective grandparents,[21] unless the Court finds the child consents and it is in the best interest of the child to retain a right of visitation. Visitation between the child and his siblings shall continue, and a plan for regular contact between siblings, where they are not placed together, shall be incorporated into the permanent plan for the child whenever possible, unless the court finds it is not in the best interest of both the child and his siblings to retain a right of visitation.

[21] This rule is intended to neither increase nor decrease any rights of the grandparents as set forth in W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-601, et seq. and 48-10-101, et seq.

Rule 16. Emergency custody.

(a) Emergency custody pending filing of petition. Proceedings for emergency custody of a child before a petition is filed and without a circuit court order shall be governed by the provisions of W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-301 (emergency custody by law enforcement), 49-4-302 (emergency custody ordered by family court), and 49-4-303 (emergency removal by the Department).

(b) Continuation or transfer of emergency custody upon filing of petition. Proceedings for continuation of or temporary transfer of emergency custody at the time the petition is filed shall be governed by the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-4-602.

(c) Transfer of custody following filing of petition. If at any time during the pendency of child abuse and/or neglect proceedings, the court determines the child is in imminent danger, as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-201, the court may order the child placed into the custody of the Department or a responsible person in accordance with the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-4-602. If custody has been taken pursuant to this provision after the conclusion of the final adjudicatory hearing, custody of the child may continue in the Department or a responsible person pending conclusion of the final disposition hearing.

(d) Requirement of hearing on emergency custody taken during the pendency of child abuse and neglect proceeding. Regardless of whether the court has previously granted the Department legal custody of a child, if the Department takes physical custody of a child during the pendency of a child abuse and neglect case (also known as removing the child) due to a change in circumstances and without a court order issued at the time of the removal, the Department must immediately notify the court, and a hearing shall take place within 10 days to determine if (1) there is imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and (2) there is no reasonably available alternative to removal of the child.

(e) Findings in removal order. An order removing a child from his or her home and placing the child in the custody of the Department must state (1) that there is reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger; (2) that continuation in the home is contrary to the welfare of the child, setting forth the reasons; (3) whether the Department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and to prevent the child's removal from his or her home or that an emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and (4) whether efforts should be made by the Department to facilitate the child's return, and if so, what efforts should be made.

Rule 16a. Required Entry of Support Orders.

(a) Entry of Support Orders. Every order in a child abuse and neglect proceeding that alters the custodial and decision-making responsibility for a child and/or commits the child to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources must impose a support obligation upon one or both parents for the support, maintenance and education of the child, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-801, et seq.

(b) Use of Guidelines. Any order establishing a child support obligation in an abuse and neglect proceeding must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code § 48-13-101, et seq. The Guidelines may be disregarded, or the calculation of an award under the Guidelines may be adjusted, only if the court makes specific findings that use of the Guidelines is inappropriate.

(c) Modifications. Any order establishing a child support obligation in a child abuse and neglect proceeding may be modified by the court upon motion of any party. An order granting modification of a support obligation must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W. Va. Code § 48-13-101, et seq.

(d) Transfer to family court prohibited. No portion of a child abuse and neglect proceeding may be transferred or remanded to a family court for assessment of a child support obligation.

Rule 17. Pleadings allowed, Form of motions and other papers.

(a) Pleadings. There shall be a verified petition and a verified answer. Upon mutual consent of the co-petitioners, the verified petition may have co-petitioners, in which case each petitioner must indicate which allegation(s) he/she verifies in the petition. If one of the petitioners is a parent, then that parent shall be appointed counsel pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(f), separate from the prosecuting attorney. The Department, a parent, or reputable person may move to be joined as a co-petitioner after the filing of the initial petition. No other pleading shall be allowed except by permission of the court. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. Other than in a criminal prosecution for false swearing, evidence shall not be given against an accused of any statement made by him in any pleadings filed pursuant to these rules.

(b) Verified answer. Each respondent shall file and serve a verified answer upon the petitioner or counsel therefor and all other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard no later than 10 days after being served with the notice and petition required by law except that a respondent served by publication or other substituted service shall file and serve such answer within the time prescribed by such substituted service. The child or children are not required to file or serve an answer.

Each answer shall admit or controvert the allegations of the petition, state the relationship of the child or children to the respondent and respond to such other matters as are alleged therein.

No preliminary hearing need be continued because an answer has not been served nor shall any appearance at a preliminary hearing or the service or contents of any answer filed prevent a respondent from raising in the answer or by timely motion any issue formerly raised by special appearance or by a pleading filed before an answer.

(c) Motions and other papers. (1) An application to the court for an order shall be by motion which, unless made during a hearing or trial, shall be made in writing, shall state with particularity the grounds therefor, and shall set forth the relief or order sought.

The requirement of writing is fulfilled if the motion is made in a written notice of the hearing on the motion.

(2) The rules applicable to captions and other matters of form of pleadings apply to all motions and other papers provided for by these rules.

(3) All motions shall be signed in accordance with Rule 11 of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

(4) All motions must be accompanied by or contained within a notice of hearing setting forth the date and time of hearing on the motion.

(5) At the time of first hearing, the court shall require the parents to complete financial statement forms for determination of Title IV-D and Title IV-E eligibility, the necessary forms to be provided by the Department of Health and Human Resources, and those forms necessary to determine both indigence and/or possible child support obligations. No portion of the case may be transferred or remanded to family court for this purpose.

Rule 18. Contents of petition.

The petition shall be verified in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(b) and shall include the following:

(a) Citations to statutes relied upon in requesting the intervention of the court and how the alleged misconduct or incapacity comes within the statutory definition of neglect and/or abuse;

(b) A description of all of the children in the home or in the temporary care, custody, or control of the alleged offending parent(s), including name, age, sex, and current location, unless stating the location would endanger the child or seriously risk disruption of the current placement;

(c) A statement of facts justifying court intervention which is definite and particular and describes:

(1) The specific misconduct, including time and place, if known, or incapacity of the parent(s) and other person(s) responsible for the child's care; and

(2) Any supportive services provided by the Department or others to remedy the alleged circumstances.

(d) The relief sought; and

(e) Information as required by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, W. Va. Code § 48-20-101 et seq.

Rule 18a. Appointments; responsibilities of guardian ad litem.

(a) Appointment. W.Va. Code § 49-4-601(f) and the Guidelines for Children's Guardians Ad Litem in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings set forth in Appendix A of these Rules govern the appointment of a child's guardian ad litem in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. In the initial order resulting from the filing of an abuse and neglect petition, the circuit court appoints a guardian ad litem to represent a child from a list of qualified attorneys who have completed the required guardian ad litem training. A guardian ad litem may be appointed to represent more than one child unless the representation of more than one child creates a conflict of interest.

(b) Responsibilities of guardian ad litem. A guardian ad litem should adhere to the Guidelines for Children's Guardians Ad Litem in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings set forth in Appendix A of these Rules and submit a written report to the court and provide a copy to all parties at least five (5) days prior to the disposition hearing that complies with the requirements set forth in Section D(8) of the Guidelines and Appendix B of these Rules. Upon petition of the guardian ad litem, the court, in its discretion, may seal the report or redact information contained in the report.

Rule 19. Amendments to petition.

(a) Amendments prior to adjudicatory hearing. The court may allow the petition to be amended at any time until the final adjudicatory hearing begins, provided that an adverse party is granted sufficient time to respond to the amendment.

(b) Amendments after the adjudicatory hearing. If new allegations arise after the final adjudicatory hearing, the allegations should be included in an amended petition rather than in a separate petition in a new civil action, and the final adjudicatory hearing shall be re-opened for the purpose of hearing evidence on the new allegations in the amended petition.

(c) Amendments based on allegations against a co-petitioner. If allegations arise against a co-petitioner during the pendency of the case, then the petition may be amended, including a realignment of the parties.

(d) Amendments after preliminary hearing in which the Department has been given temporary custody. If the petition is amended after the conclusion of a preliminary hearing in which custody has been temporarily transferred to the Department or a responsible person, it shall be unnecessary to conduct another preliminary hearing.

Rule 20. Notice of first hearing.

The petition and notice of the first hearing shall provide at least ten (10) days notice, unless the first hearing is a preliminary hearing regarding emergency custody pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-602, in which case the parties and all persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard must be provided at least five (5) days actual notice. The notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the first hearing, the right of parties to counsel, and the fact that the proceeding can result in the permanent termination of parental, custodial or guardianship rights. The court shall send a copy of the petition and notice of first hearing to the appropriate CASA representative, if one is appointed.

Rule 21. Effect of personal service on only one parent.

The judge may permit the child abuse and neglect proceeding to go forward after one parent personally is served, if it is established on the record that there have been diligent but unsuccessful efforts to serve all other parties and requisites of W. Va. Code § 49-4-601 have been met. When a child is found in this state and is under the protection of the court and no parent or custodian has been found within this jurisdiction, the court may order service of the notice by publication and proceed with the proceeding. No adjudicatory hearing may be held until the time for answer is set forth in the order of publication shall have expired. Such a proceeding shall be effective against the interests to parents and custodians to the extent permissible under general law.

Rule 22. Preliminary hearing.

(a) Timing of preliminary hearing. If at the time the petition was filed, the court placed or continued the child in the emergency custody of the Department or a responsible person, a preliminary hearing on emergency custody shall be initiated within ten (10) days after the continuation or transfer of custody is ordered as required by W. Va. Code § 49-4-602.

(b) Transfer of custody after the filing of the petition. If the court does not transfer custody at the time the petition is filed, but believes at any time in the proceeding that the child is in imminent danger, as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-201, the court may transfer temporary custody as provided in W. Va. Code § 49-4-602 or Rule 16(c). If the court has continued or transferred temporary custody to the Department or a responsible person following the preliminary hearing and further amendments and additions are made to the petition or further facts are developed which support temporary custody, another preliminary hearing is not required.

(c) Waiver or stipulation of preliminary hearing. A preliminary hearing may be waived or stipulated if the court determines (1) that the parties and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard understand the content and consequences of the waiver or stipulation and voluntarily consent, and (2) that the waiver or stipulation of the preliminary hearing meets the purposes of these rules and controlling statutes and is in the best interests of the child. The court shall hear any objection to the waiver or stipulation of the preliminary hearing by any party or person entitled to notice and the right to be heard. The waiver or specific stipulations shall be incorporated into the order reflecting the preliminary hearing.

Rule 23. Preadjudicatory improvement period; family case plan; status conference.

(a) Preadjudicatory improvement period. At any time prior to the final adjudicatory hearing, including at the preliminary hearing or emergency custody proceedings, a respondent may move for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-4-610. If the motion is granted, the court shall order the Department to submit the family case plan within thirty (30) days of such order, which family case plan shall contain the information required by W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-408 and 49-4-604. The family case plan shall be formulated with the assistance of all parties, counsel, and the multi-disciplinary treatment team. The family case plan and improvement period order should closely track one another and taken together should constitute a program designed to remedy the circumstances which led to the filing of the petition. Reasonable efforts to place a child for adoption, or with a legal guardian or other permanent placement may be made at the same time.

(b) Preadjudicatory improvement period status conferences. For the duration of the preadjudicatory improvement period, in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-4-610, the court shall convene a status conference within sixty (60) days of the granting of the improvement period or within ninety (90) days of the granting of the improvement period if the court orders the Department to submit a report as to the respondent's progress in the improvement period within sixty (60) days of the order granting the improvement period. At the status conference, the multidisciplinary treatment team shall attend and report as to progress and developments in the case. The court may require or accept progress reports or statements from other persons, including the parties, service providers, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, provided that such reports or statements are provided to all parties. Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-610, a preadjudicatory improvement period shall not exceed three months. If the respondent(s) fail to comply with the terms and conditions of the improvement period or evidence an inability to remediate the circumstances giving rise to the abuse and/or neglect, any party may file a motion to revoke the improvement period.

Rule 24. Adjudicatory prehearing conference.

(a) Adjudicatory prehearing conference. Prior to the final adjudicatory hearing, the court may convene a prehearing conference on its own motion or upon the request of any party.

(b) Subjects of adjudicatory subjects prehearing conference. At the adjudicatory prehearing conference, the court may

(1) Review efforts to locate and serve all the parties;

(2) Advise unrepresented parties concerning their right to counsel and to appointed counsel, in which case the conference shall be reconvened at a later date;

(3) Determine whether the child shall be present and testify at adjudication and, if so, under what conditions;

(4) Conclude any unresolved discovery matters;

(5) Identify issues of law and fact for adjudication;

(6) Require the parties to develop a list of possible witnesses and brief summaries of their testimony;

(7) Determine the needs of out-of-town witnesses regarding scheduling; and

(8) Confirm the date and estimate the length of the adjudicatory hearing.

(c) Additional information. The parties shall have a continuing obligation to update information provided during the adjudicatory prehearing conference. If the additional information constitutes surprise, the court shall allow the surprised party adequate time and opportunity to prepare and respond.

(d) Time frame. The court may schedule a final prehearing conference within five (5) days of the adjudicatory hearing to determine whether the parties or other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard have notice of the hearing, the number and identity of the witnesses that each party intends to call and the estimated length of their testimony, and any other matter which may affect the conduct of the adjudicatory hearing.

Rule 25. Time of final adjudicatory hearing.

When a child is placed in the temporary custody of the Department or a responsible person pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-602, the final adjudicatory hearing shall commence within thirty (30) days of the temporary custody order entered following the preliminary hearing and must be given priority on the docket unless a preadjudicatory improvement period has been ordered. In all other cases, the final adjudicatory hearing shall commence within thirty (30) days of the filing of the petition or, if a preadjudicatory improvement period has been ordered, as soon as possible, but no later than thirty (30) days, after the conclusion of such preadjudicatory improvement period. Where a respondent has been served, no order adjudicating that such respondent has abused or neglected the child concerned until the time for answer for such respondent has expired and, if the answer is timely served, the respondent has been afforded at least 20 days from the date the answer was filed to prepare for adjudication or has waived such opportunity to prepare. The final adjudicatory hearing shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i).

Rule 26. Stipulated adjudication, uncontested petitions, contents of written reports* and admissions.

(a) Required information. Any stipulated or uncontested adjudication shall include the following information:

(1) Agreed upon facts supporting court involvement regarding the respondent's problems, conduct, or condition; and

(2) A statement of respondent's problems or deficiencies to be addressed at the final disposition.

(b) Voluntariness of consent. Before accepting a stipulated or uncontested adjudication, the court shall determine that the parties understand the content and consequences of the admission or stipulation, the parties voluntarily consent, and that the stipulation or uncontested adjudication meets the purposes of these rules and controlling statute and is in the best interests of the child.

(c) Contents of written reports. The court may take judicial notice of written reports which constitute public records and, when so admitted into evidence, give thereto such weight as may be appropriate. Any party may request the opportunity to be heard with respect to such reports under Rule 201(e) of the Rules of Evidence. Reasonable efforts should be made by parties and the court to inform all parties and all other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard of the intention to submit or consider such reports to the end that those parties and other persons desiring to be heard with respect thereto may adequately prepare.

(d) Effect of admissions by respondents. Admissions by a respondent properly contained in an answer and any written stipulations made by a respondent may be admitted into evidence at any stage of the proceedings and given such weight by the court as may be appropriate if the court finds that such admissions or stipulations are reliable. If the reliability of such admissions or stipulations is challenged for fraud, duress or other like cause, the court shall determine the issues thus drawn on the record. Extra judicial admissions by a respondent shall be admitted into evidence under any circumstances permitted by the rules of evidence.

Rule 27. Findings; adjudication order.

At the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, the court shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing or on the record, as to whether the child is abused and/or neglected in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-4-601(i). The court shall enter an order of adjudication, including findings of fact and conclusions of law, within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the hearing, and the parties and all other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard shall be given notice of the entry of this order.

Rule 28. Disposition report by Department -- The child's case plan; contents of the child's case plan.

(a) The Department shall prepare a child's case plan as required by W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-408 and 49-4-604, in the format approved by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia and the Department. If parental rights have not been terminated, the plan should include, where applicable, the requirements of the family case plan. Parents, children capable of expressing their preferences, foster parents or relative caregivers, and members of the multidisciplinary treatment team should be included in the case plan development. The case plan should include, but need not be limited to, the following:

(1) A statement of the changes needed to correct the problems necessitating Department intervention, with timetables for accomplishing them;

(2) A description of services for the child, parents, and foster parents or relative caregivers that will assist the family in remedying the identified problems, including an explanation of the appropriateness, availability of suggested services, and reasonable accommodations in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, 42 U.S.C. § 12101, et seq., to parents with disabilities in order to allow them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services;

(3) A description of behavioral changes that must be evidenced by the respondents to correct the identified problems;

(4) The permanency plan and concurrent plan for the child, which are designed to achieve timely permanency for the child in the least restrictive setting available. Unless reasonable efforts to prevent removal or to preserve the family are not required, documentation must be provided to show reasonable efforts to prevent removal or to ensure reunification within the timeframes set in the plan, as well as reasonable efforts to work toward the concurrent plan, which may be adoption, minor guardianship, another planned permanent living arrangement (APPLA), or emancipation; and

(5) When the child's permanency plan is APPLA, the Department shall document the efforts to place the child permanently with a parent, relative, or in a guardianship or adoptive placement and the steps taken to ensure that the foster family follows the "reasonable and prudent parent standard" to allow the child regular opportunities to engage in age- or developmentally-appropriate normal childhood activities.

(b) When the child has been in emergency protective care or temporary custody during the proceedings or the Department's recommendation includes placement of the child away from home, the report also shall include the following:

(1) A description of the efforts made by the Department to prevent the need for placement or the circumstances which made the offer of such efforts an unviable option; and

(2) A description of the efforts since placement to reunify the family, including services which were offered or provided or the reasons why such efforts would be unavailing or not in the best interest of the child.

(c) When the Department's recommendation includes placement of the child away from home, whether temporarily or permanently, the report also shall include the following:

(1) An explanation why the child cannot be protected from the identified problems in the home even with the provision of services or why placement in the home is not in the best interest of the child;

(2) Identification of relatives or friends who were contacted about providing a suitable and safe permanent placement for the child;

(3) A description of the recommended placement or type of home or institutional placement in which the child is to be placed, including its distance from the child's home and whether or not it is the least restrictive (most family-like) one available and including a discussion of the appropriateness of the placement and how the agency which is responsible for the child plans to assure that the child receives proper care and that services are provided to the parents, child, and foster parents in order to improve the conditions in the parent's/respondent's home, facilitate return of the child to his or her own home or the permanent placement of the child;

(4) Assurances that the placement of the child takes into account the appropriateness of the current educational setting and the proximity to the school in which the child is enrolled at the time of placement; that the Department has coordinated with appropriate local education agencies to ensure that the child remains enrolled in the school in which the child was enrolled at the time of placement, including provision for reasonable travel; and if remaining in the same school is not in the child's best interests, that the Department and local education agencies have provided immediate and appropriate enrollment in a new school, with all of the education records of the child provided to the school;

(5) A suggested visitation plan including an explanation of any conditions to be placed on the visits;

(6) A statement of the child's special needs and the ways they should be met while in placement, including a plan for how the child will have regular opportunities to engage in age- or developmentally-appropriate normal childhood activities;

(7) The location of any siblings and, if siblings are separated, a statement of the reasons for the separation and the steps required to unite them as quickly as possible and to maintain regular contact during the separation if it is in each child's best interest;

(8) For children aged 14 or older, the plan should specify services aimed at transitioning the child into adulthood. When a child turns 17, or as soon as a child aged 17 comes into a case, the Department must immediately provide the child with assistance and support in developing a transition plan that is personalized at the direction of the child. The plan must include specific options on housing, health insurance, education, local opportunities for mentors, continuing support services, work force support, and employment services, and the plan should be as detailed as the child may elect. In addition to these requirements, when a child with special needs turns 17, or as soon as a child aged 17 with special needs comes into a case, he or she is entitled to the appointment of a Department adult services worker to the multidisciplinary treatment team and coordination between the multidisciplinary treatment team and other transition planning teams, such as special education individualized education planning (IEP) teams;

(9) The ability of the parent(s) to contribute financially to placement; and

(10) The current address and telephone number of the parties or a statement why such information is not provided.

(d) When the Department's recommendation is for termination of parental rights, the report shall include those items set forth in subsections (b) and (c) above and also the following:

(1) A description of the efforts made by the Department to prevent the need for placement or the circumstances which made the offer of such efforts an unviable option;

(2) A description of the efforts since placement to reunify the family, including services which were offered or provided or the reasons why such efforts would be unavailing; and

(3) Any objections by any party to the contents of the child's case plan may be raised at the disposition hearing.

Rule 29. Notice of the child's case plan.

Copies of the child's case plan shall be provided to the parties, their counsel, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, at least five (5) judicial days prior to the disposition hearing.

Rule 30. Exchange of information before disposition hearing.

At least five (5) judicial days prior to the disposition hearing, each party shall provide the other parties, persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, and the court a list of possible witnesses, with a brief summary of the testimony to be presented at the disposition hearing, and a list of issues of law and fact. Parties shall have a continuing obligation to update information until the time of the disposition hearing.

Rule 31. Notice of disposition hearing.

Notice of the date, time, and place of the disposition hearing shall be given to all parties, their counsel, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard.

Rule 32. Time of disposition hearing.

(a) Time frame. The disposition hearing shall commence within forty-five (45) days of the entry of the final adjudicatory order unless an improvement period is granted pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-610(2) and then no later than sixty (60) days.

(b) Accelerated disposition hearing. The disposition hearing immediately may follow the adjudication hearing if:

(1) All the parties agree;

(2) A child's case plan meeting the requirements of W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-408 and 49-4-604 was completed and provided to the court or the party or the parties have waived the requirement that the child's case plan be submitted prior to disposition; and

(3) Notice of the disposition hearing was provided to or waived by all parties as required by these Rules.

Rule 33. Stipulated disposition, contents of stipulation, voluntariness.

(a) Required information. Unless otherwise ordered by the court, any stipulated or uncontested disposition shall include the following information:

(1) The legal custody and placement of the child;

(2) The changes needed to end the court's involvement;

(3) Services to be provided to the child and family;

(4) The terms and conditions of the family case plan, unless the stipulated disposition terminates parental rights or places the child in legal guardianship or permanent foster care;

(5) The schedule of multidisciplinary treatment team meetings and permanent placement review conferences, including the first date and time of each;

(6) Restraining orders controlling the conduct of any party who is likely to frustrate the dispositional order;

(7) If a child is to be placed away from home, the proposed stipulated disposition shall also address:

(A) The type of placement;

(B) Terms of visitation and other parental involvement, including information about the child to be provided to the parents;

(C) Steps to meet the child's special needs while in placement; and

(D) If the child is separated from siblings, steps to unite them and/or to maintain regular contact during the separation;

(8) Any other aspect of the case plan the parties want included in the court's order.

(9) A stipulated disposition involving a temporary out-of-house placement cannot be permitted beyond the time allowable by statute for an improvement period.

(b) Voluntariness of consent. Before determining whether or not to accept a stipulation of disposition, the court shall determine that the parties and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, understand the contents of the stipulation and its consequences, and that the parties voluntarily consent to its terms. The court must ultimately decide whether the stipulation of disposition meets the purposes of these rules, controlling statutes and is in the best interests of the child. The court shall hear any objection to the stipulation of disposition made by any party or persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. The stipulations shall be specifically incorporated in their entirety into the court's order reflecting disposition of the case.

Rule 34. Rulings on objections to the child's case plan.

If objections to the child's case plan are raised at the disposition hearing, the court shall enter an order:

(a) Approving the plan;

(b) Ordering compliance with all or part of the plan;

(c) Modifying the plan in accordance with the evidence presented at the hearing; or

(d) Rejecting the plan and ordering the Department to submit a revised plan with thirty (30) days. If the court rejects the child's case plan, the court shall schedule another disposition hearing within forty-five (45) days.

Rule 35. Uncontested termination of parental rights and contested termination and contests to the case plan.

(a) Uncontested termination of parental rights. If a parent voluntarily relinquishes parental rights or fails to contest termination of parental rights, the court shall make the following inquiry at the disposition hearing:

(1) If the parent is present at the hearing but fails to contest termination of parental rights, the court shall determine whether the parent fully understands the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

(2) If the parent is not present in court and has not relinquished parental rights but has failed to contest the termination, the petitioner shall make a prima facie ("on its face") showing that there is a legal basis for the termination of parental rights and the court shall determine whether the parent was given proper notice of the proceedings.

(3) If the parent is present in court and voluntarily has signed a relinquishment of parental rights, the court shall determine whether the parent fully understands the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

(4) If the parent is not present in court but has signed a relinquishment of parental rights, the court shall determine whether there was compliance with all state law requirements regarding a written voluntary relinquishment of parental rights and whether the parent was thoroughly advised of and understood the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

(b) Contested terminations and contests to case plan.

(1) When termination of parental rights is sought and resisted, the court shall hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues thus made, including the issues specified by statute and make such findings with respect thereto as the evidence shall justify. Upon making such findings, the court shall then determine if the case plan or plans before the court require amendment by reason of the findings of the court and require such modification of the plan or plans as may be appropriate.

(2) The guardian ad litem for the children, the respondents and their counsel, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, shall advise at the dispositional hearing and, where termination is sought after the court's findings on the factual issues surrounding termination are announced, whether any such persons seek a modification of the child's case plan as submitted or desire to offer a substitute child's case plan for consideration by the court. The court shall require any proposed modifications or substitute plans to be promptly laid before the court and take such action, including the receipt of evidence with respect thereto, as the circumstances shall require. It shall be the duty of all the parties to the proceeding and their counsel to co-operate with the court in making this information available to the court as early as possible. It shall also be appropriate for the court to require alternative provisions of a case plan to be submitted prior to the taking of evidence in a dispositional hearing to suit alternative possible findings of the court after evidence is taken on any contested issues. Except as to the establishment of grounds for termination and the establishment of other necessary facts, dispositional hearings are not intended to be confrontational hearings; rather such are concerned with the best interests of the abused or neglected children involved.

Rule 36. Findings; disposition order.

(a) Findings of fact and conclusions of law; time frame. At the conclusion of the disposition hearing, the court shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing or on the record, as to the appropriate disposition in accordance with the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-4-604. The court shall enter a disposition order, including findings of fact and conclusions of law, within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the hearing.

(b) Permanent placement review conference. In the disposition order the court also shall state the date and time of the first permanent placement review conference required under these rules.

(c) Contents of disposition order. The court also may include in the disposition order the following information:

(1) Terms of visitation;

(2) Services to be provided to the child and family;

(3) Restraining orders controlling the conduct of any party who is likely to frustrate the disposition order;

(4) Actions to be taken by the parent(s) to correct the identified problems;

(5) Conditions regarding the child's placement, including steps to meet the child's special needs while in placement;

(6) If the child is separated from siblings, steps to unite them and/or to maintain regular contact during the separation if it is in the best interest of each child; and

(7) Terms and conditions of the family case plan or the child's case plan.

(d) Notice of permanency hearing. If a permanency hearing must be conducted pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-608, then the disposition order shall state the date and time of the permanency hearing.

(e) Interaction with administrative processes of the Department. The court has exclusive jurisdiction to determine the permanent placement of a child. Placement of a child shall not be disrupted or delayed by any administrative process of the Department, including an adoption review committee or grievance procedure.

Rule 36a. Permanency hearing.

(a) If the court finds at any hearing that the Department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family, then a permanency hearing must be held within 30 days following entry of the order so finding. The purpose of the permanency hearing is to determine the appropriate permanent placement and plan for the child. All parties, counsel, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, shall be given notice of this hearing at least 5 judicial days in advance thereof.

(b) If the Court finds, at any stage of the proceeding, that reasonable efforts must be made by the Department to preserve the family or any part of it, then a permanency hearing must be conducted within one year from the date the child entered foster care which shall be deemed to be the earlier of the following:

(i) The date of the first judicial finding that the child has been subjected to child abuse or neglect; or

(ii) The date that is 60 days after the date on which the child is removed from the home.

(c) In accordance with Rules 39 to 42, the court shall conduct permanent placement review conferences at least every three months thereafter to determine if the Department has made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan for the child.

Rule 37. Improvement period; status conference.

If an improvement period is ordered following the final adjudicatory hearing or as an alternative disposition pursuant to W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-604(d) and 49-4-610(2) or (3), the court shall order the Department to submit a family case plan within thirty (30) days of such order containing the information required by W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-408 and 49-4-604. The family case plan shall be formulated with the assistance of all parties, counsel and the multi-disciplinary treatment team. Reasonable efforts to place a child for adoption or with a legal guardian or other permanent placement may be made at the same time. In accord with W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-610(2) and (3), the court shall convene a status conference within sixty (60) days of the granting of the improvement period or within ninety (90) days of the granting of the improvement period if the court orders the Department to submit a report as to the respondent's progress in the improvement period within sixty (60) days of the order granting the improvement period. The court shall thereafter convene a status conference at least once every three months for the duration of each improvement period, with notice given to any party and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. At the status conference, the multidisciplinary treatment team shall attend and report as to progress and developments in the case. The court may require or accept progress reports or statements from other persons, including the parties, service providers, and the CASA representative provided that such reports or statements are given to all parties.

Rule 38. Hearing after improvement period; final disposition.

No later than thirty (30) days after the end of the alternative disposition improvement period, the court shall hold a hearing to determine the final disposition of the case, including whether the conditions of abuse and/or neglect have been adequately improved in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(d). Any party and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard shall receive notice of the hearing. The court also shall determine the necessary disposition consistent with the best interests of the child. Within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the hearing, the court shall enter a final disposition order in accordance with the provisions of Rule 37.

Rule 39. Permanent placement review.

Rule 6 requires the court to maintain the case on the docket until permanent placement is achieved. Permanent placement is defined in Rule 3(n).

(a) Court monitoring of permanency plan. Following entry of a permanency hearing order, the court, with the assistance of the multidisciplinary treatment team, shall continue to monitor implementation of the court-ordered permanency plan for the child.

(b) Time frame. At least once every three months until permanent placement is achieved as defined in Rule 6, the court shall conduct a permanent placement review conference, requiring the multidisciplinary treatment team to attend and report as to progress and development in the case, for the purpose of reviewing the progress in the permanent placement of the child.

(c) Notice of hearing. Notice of the time and place of the permanent placement review conference shall be given to counsel of record, and all other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard at least fifteen (15) days prior to the conference unless otherwise provided by court order. Neither a party whose parental rights have been terminated by the final disposition order nor his or her attorney shall be given notice of or participate in post-disposition proceedings.

(d) Hearing. The court shall hold a hearing in connection with such review, and shall not conduct such review by agreed order.

Rule 40. Permanent placement review reports.

At least ten (10) days before the permanent placement review conference, the multidisciplinary treatment team and the Department shall provide to the court and to the parties progress reports describing efforts to implement the permanency plan and any obstacles to permanent placement. The court may require or accept progress reports or statements from other persons, including the parties, service providers, and the CASA representative, provided that such reports or statements are given to all parties prior to the placement review conference.

Rule 41. Permanent placement review conference.

(a) Subjects of permanent placement review conference. Unless otherwise provided by court order, matters to be considered at the permanent placement review conference shall include a discussion of the reasonable efforts made to secure a permanent placement, including:

(1) The extent to which problems necessitating Department intervention have been remedied and, if appropriate, the actions that should be taken by the respondent(s) to permit return of the child;

(2) Services and assistance that were offered or provided to the family since the previous hearing or permanent placement review conference; reasonable accommodations provided in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990,

42 U.S.C. § 12101, et seq., to parents with disabilities in order to allow them meaningful access to reunification and family preservation services; and services needed in the future;

(3) Compliance by the respondent and Department with the case plan and with previous orders and recommendations of the court;

(4) Recommended changes in court orders;

(5) The ability and extent of the respondent to contribute financially to the child's placement;

(6) The appropriateness of the current placement, including its distance from the child's home and whether or not it is the least restrictive one (most family-like one) available;

(7) The appropriateness of the current educational setting and the proximity to the school in which the child is enrolled at the time of placement;

(8) The Department's coordination with appropriate local education agencies to ensure that the child remains enrolled in the school in which the child was enrolled at the time of placement, including provision for reasonable travel, or if remaining in the same school is not in the child's best interests, the provision of immediate and appropriate enrollment in a new school, with all of the education records of the child provided to the school;

(9) A summary of visitation and any recommended changes;

(10) How the child's special needs were or were not met while in placement, including whether the child had regular opportunities to engage in age- or developmentally-appropriate normal childhood activities;

(11) The location of any siblings and the steps that have been and will be taken to unite them as quickly as possible and to maintain regular contact during the separation if it is in the best interest of each child;

(12) For children aged 14 or older, the specific services aimed at transitioning the child into adulthood. When a child turns 17, or as soon as a child aged 17 comes into a case, the Department must immediately provide the child with assistance and support in developing a transition plan that is personalized at the direction of the child. The plan must include specific options on housing, health insurance, education, local opportunities for mentors, continuing support services, work force support, and employment services, and the plan should be as detailed as the child may elect. In addition to these requirements, when a child with special needs turns 17, or as soon as a child aged 17 with special needs comes into a case, he or she is entitled to the appointment of a Department adult services worker to the multidisciplinary treatment team and coordination between the multidisciplinary treatment team and other transition planning teams, such as special education individualized education planning (IEP) teams;

(13) When the child's permanency plan is another planned permanent living arrangement (APPLA), the efforts to place the child permanently with a parent, relative, or in a guardianship or adoptive placement; the child's desired permanency outcome; and the steps taken to ensure that the foster family follows the "reasonable and prudent parent standard" to allow the child regular opportunities to engage in age- or developmentally-appropriate normal childhood activities;

(14) A recommendation and discussion regarding the child's return home either immediately or within the next six months.

(A) If return is recommended, it shall include a summary of:

(i) Necessary steps to make return possible and to minimize the disruptive effects of return;

(ii) The dangers to the child after return; and

(iii) Reunification services needed, including services to minimize any danger to the child after return;

(B) If return is not recommended, a recommendation and discussion regarding adoption of the child. If placement for adoption is recommended, it shall include a discussion of:

(i) The steps needed to bring about a termination of parental rights action; and

(ii) The time necessary to take such steps;

(C) If neither return home nor placement for adoption is recommended, a discussion of the following shall be included:

(i) Awarding legal guardianship or permanent custody to a specific individual or individuals. If recommended, a proposed time table, recommendations concerning the rights and responsibilities the biological parent should retain, and recommendations concerning the rights and responsibilities of the guardian or custodian shall be addressed; and

(ii) Placement of the child permanently in foster care with specific foster parents. If recommended, a time table and recommendations concerning the terms of the permanent foster care agreement, and court order authorizing permanent foster care, and the continuing rights and responsibilities of the biological parents shall be addressed;

(D) If continued foster care is recommended, an explanation of why it continues to be appropriate for the child;

(E) If placement in a group home or institution is recommended:

(i) An explanation of why treatment outside a family environment is necessary, including a brief summary of supporting expert diagnoses and recommendations; and

(ii) A discussion of why a less restrictive, more family-like setting is not practical, including placement with specially trained foster parents;

(F) If emancipation or independent living is recommended for a child who has attained age sixteen (16) years, an explanation of why foster family care is no longer appropriate; a description of the skills needed by the child to prepare for adulthood; and a description of the ongoing support and services to be provided by the agency; and

(G) Concurrent alternative permanency plans.

(H) Any other matter relevant to implementation of the permanency plan.

(b) Post-termination placement plan. Within ninety (90) days of the entry of the final termination order or decree for both parents, the Department responsible for placement of the child shall submit a written permanent placement plan to the court, the guardian ad litem, persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, and other remaining parties, if any, for consideration at the permanent placement review. The plan shall include the following:

(1) A description of the Department's progress toward arranging an adoptive, legal guardianship, or permanent foster care home placement for the child;

(2) Where adoptive, legal guardians, or permanent foster care parents have not been selected, a schedule and a description of steps to be taken to place the child permanently;

(3) A discussion of any special barriers preventing placement of the child for adoption, legal guardianship, or permanent foster care and how they should be overcome; and

(4) A discussion of whether adoption and/or legal guardianship subsidy is needed and, if so, the likely amount and type of subsidy required.

The court shall continue to conduct a permanent placement review at least every three (3) months until permanent placement is achieved. The court shall hold a hearing in connection with such review, and shall not conduct such review by agreed order. Notice of such hearing shall be given to the Department, the child through his guardian ad litem, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard.

(c) Stipulations. The parties may file written stipulations as to any matters to be considered at the permanent placement review conference but such written stipulations shall not be accepted in lieu of the conducting of the permanent placement review conference.

Rule 42. Findings at permanent placement review; order.

(a) Findings of fact and conclusions of law; time frame. Within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the permanent placement review conference, the court shall enter an order determining whether the Department has made reasonable efforts to finalize the permanency plan for the child. The court shall also find whether permanent placement has been fully achieved within the meaning of Rule 6 and stating findings of fact and conclusions of law to support its determination.

(b) Dismissal. If the court finds that permanent placement has been achieved, it may order the case dismissed from the docket.

(c) Continuance. If the court finds that permanent placement has not been achieved, the court's order shall address those subjects set forth in Rule 41 as appropriate and shall state:

(1) Changes in the terms of the child's case plan it deems necessary to effect a permanent placement of the child, with supporting findings of fact;

(2) Changes in the terms of visitation and other parental involvement, if any;

(3) Changes in services to be provided the parties and the child, if any;

(4) Changes to the educational plan for the child to further the child's educational stability, if any;

(5) Steps to be taken to assist a child aged 14 or older with the development of a transitional plan;

(6) Restraining orders controlling the conduct of any party who is likely to frustrate the court's orders, if any;

(7) Additional actions to be taken by the parties to achieve permanent placement; and

(8) A date and time for the next placement review conference.

(d) Findings when the permanency plan is another planned permanent living arrangement (APPLA). After asking the child for his or her desired permanency outcome, the court shall find whether APPLA is the best permanency plan for the child; review Department efforts to place the child permanently with a parent, relative, or in guardianship or adoptive placement; and find compelling reasons why it is not in the child's best interests to be placed permanently with a parent, relative, or in a guardianship or adoptive placement.

Rule 43. Time for permanent placement.

Permanent placement of each child shall be achieved within twelve (12) months of the final disposition order, unless the court specifically finds on the record extraordinary reasons sufficient to justify the delay.

Rule 44. Foster care review.

Nothing in these rules is intended to abrogate the responsibilities of the Department and the court with regard to the foster care case review system established by W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-110 and 49-4-608. Upon the filing of a foster care case review petition by the Department, the court may schedule a foster care case review hearing at the same time as the required permanent placement review conference contemplated by these rules. Such proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the pertinent statute and these rules.

Rule 45. Review following permanent placement; reporting permanent placement changes.

(a) Discontinuation of permanent placement review. Permanent placement review shall be discontinued after permanent placement is consummated.

(b) Reporting changes in permanent placement status. If the child is removed from an adoptive home or other permanent placement after the case has been dismissed, any party with notice thereof and the receiving agency shall promptly report the matter to the circuit court of origin, the Department, and the child's counsel, and the court shall schedule a permanent placement review conference within sixty (60) days, with notice given to any appropriate parties and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. The Department shall convene a multidisciplinary treatment team meeting within thirty (30) days of the receipt of notice of permanent placement disruption.

Rule 46. Modification or supplementation of court order; stipulations.

A child, a child's parent (whose parental rights have not been terminated), a child's custodian, or the Department shall file a motion in the circuit court of original jurisdiction in order to modify or supplement an order of the court at any time; provided, that a dispositional order pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-604(b)(6) shall not be modified after the child has been adopted, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-606. The court shall conduct a hearing and, upon a showing of a material change of circumstances, may modify or supplement the order if, by clear and convincing evidence, it is in the best interest of the child. Provided: an order of child support may be modified if, by the preponderance of the evidence, there is a substantial change in circumstances, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-11-105. Adequate and timely notice of any motion for modification shall be given to the child's counsel, counsel for the child's parent(s) (whose parental rights have not been terminated) or custodian, and to the Department, as well as to other persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard. The court may consider a stipulated modification of an order, provided that the child has not been adopted as aforesaid, if the court determines that the parties and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard understand the contents and consequences of the stipulation and voluntarily consent to its terms, that the stipulation meets the purposes of these rules and controlling statutes, and that the stipulation is in the best interest of the child.

Rule 47. Status conference.

The court may convene a status conference, upon its own motion or, if requested, by any party or person entitled to notice and the right to be heard, at any time during the proceedings to allow the parties, the multidisciplinary treatment team, persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, or representatives of the Department to advise the court of pertinent developments in the case or problems which arose during the formulation and implementation of a case plan. Where it appears to the court that any such issue can not be resolved without the taking of evidence, the court may proceed to take evidence, if appropriate notice has been given in advance, or set such further hearing and require notice thereof to all remaining proper parties or persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, as the court may be advised. Upon the taking of such evidence, the court shall make such findings in the appropriate post-dispositional order as are required to dispose of the issue thus raised.

Rule 48. Separate hearing on issue of paternity.

If the paternity of a child is at issue at any time during these proceedings, the court may set a special hearing to determine paternity and shall notify the Bureau for Child Support Enforcement office.

Rule 49. Accelerated appeal for child abuse and neglect and termination of parental rights cases.

Appeals of orders under W. Va. Code § 49-4-601, et seq., are governed by the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure. Within thirty (30) days of entry of the order being appealed, the petitioner shall file a notice of appeal, including required attachments and copies, with the Office of the Clerk of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, with service provided as prescribed by the Rules of Appellate Procedure. All parties to the proceeding in the court from which the appeal is taken, including the guardian(s) ad litem for the minor children, shall be deemed parties in the Supreme Court, unless the appealing party indicates on the notice of appeal that one or more of the parties below has no interest in the outcome of the matter. An appeal must be perfected within sixty (60) days of entry of the order. The circuit court from which the appeal is taken or the Supreme Court may, for good cause shown, by order entered of record, extend such period, not to exceed a total extension of two months, if the notice of appeal was properly and timely filed by the party seeking the appeal. The filing of any motion to modify an order shall not toll the time for appeal. The Supreme Court of Appeals shall give priority to appeals of child abuse and/or neglect proceedings and termination of parental rights cases and shall establish and administer an accelerated schedule in each case, to include the completion of the record, briefing, oral argument, and decision.

Rule 50. Stays on appeal.

The filing of a petition for appeal does not operate to automatically stay the proceedings or orders of the circuit court in abuse, neglect, and/or termination of parental right cases, but the circuit court or the Supreme Court of Appeals may grant a stay upon a showing of good cause. Any party seeking a stay from the Supreme Court of Appeals pursuant to Rule 28 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure pending an appeal of neglect, abuse, and/or termination of parental rights cases shall submit a written motion for the stay and a brief statement explaining the need for the stay, discussing the effect of the stay on the ability of the circuit court to plan for the child and on the best interests of the child. This rule shall not preclude any motion to the circuit court for a stay which includes a brief statement of the issues previously set forth.

Rule 51. Multidisciplinary treatment teams.

(a) Convening of multidisciplinary treatment teams. Within thirty (30) days after the petition is filed, the court shall cause to be convened a meeting of a multidisciplinary treatment team assigned to the case, said multidisciplinary treatment team to include those members mandated pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-405, providers of services to the child and/or family, and persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard.

(b) Access to and confidentiality of information. The multidisciplinary investigative team created pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-402 and the multidisciplinary treatment team created pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-4-403, and the community team created pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-1-207 shall be afforded access to information in the possession of the Department and other agencies and the Department and other offices shall cooperate in the sharing of information as may be provided by W. Va. Code §§ 49-4-402 and 49-5-101, and any other relevant provisions of law. Any multidisciplinary team member who acquires confidential information shall not disclose such information except as provided by statute.

(c) Responsibilities. The multidisciplinary treatment team shall submit written reports to the court as required by these rules or by the court; shall meet with the court at least every three months until permanency is achieved for the child, and the case is dismissed from the docket; shall be available for status conferences and hearings as required by the court; and shall not be abrogated by an adoption review committee or other administrative process of the Department.

(d) Scope of this rule. This rule is to be construed broadly to effectuate cooperation and communication between all service providers, parties, counsel, persons entitled to notice and the right to be heard, and the court.

Rule 52. Court-appointed special advocate (CASA) representative.

(a) Appointment of court-appointed special advocate representative. Where a court-appointed special advocate program, which is in good standing as a member of the National CASA Association and the West Virginia CASA Association, is in place, the court may, after the filing of a civil petition, appoint a CASA representative to further the best interests of the child until further order of the court or until permanent placement of the child is achieved.

(b) Duties of CASA representative. A CASA representative is to be appointed primarily in proceedings involving child abuse and/or neglect. Duties of a CASA representative include an independent gathering of information through interviews and review of records; facilitating prompt and thorough review of the case; protecting and promoting the best interests of the child; follow-up and monitoring of court orders and case plans; making a written report to the court with recommendations concerning the child's welfare; and negotiating and advocating on behalf of the child.

(c) Access to information. The court may enter an order granting the CASA representative access to court records and confidential records of state, county, local agencies, and service providers, or the CASA representative may obtain a waiver for the release of such information from the parties as provided by W. Va. Code § 49-5-101, or in accordance with other law. If such an order is entered or such a waiver is obtained, the CASA representative shall be considered a person entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard and shall be given notice of pleadings, court orders, hearings, and conferences and shall be allowed to attend proceedings to the extent allowed by the court. The CASA representative shall not disclose any confidential information he or she obtains expect as authorized by statute.

(d) Notification of hearings. The CASA representative shall be notified of all hearings and changes in hearings, all status conferences, all treatment multidisciplinary team meetings, and all Department administrative reviews.

(e) Court orders. The CASA representative shall receive copies of all court orders in the case to which he or she is appointed.

(f) Termination. The CASA representative shall stay involved in the case until further order of the court or permanent placement of the child is achieved. The CASA representative shall have access to information in the selection process of adoptive parents, legal guardians or permanent foster care parents. The CASA representative also shall monitor and advocate for services for the permanent placement family until the final order is entered.

(g) Continued duties of the child's attorney. The appointment of a CASA representative shall not in any way abrogate the duties and responsibilities imposed by law on the attorney for the child. The duties and responsibilities of a child's guardian ad litem shall continue until such child has a permanent placement, and the guardian ad litem shall not be relieved of his responsibilities until such permanent placement has been achieved.

Rule 53. Case status reporting.

To effectuate the purpose of the rules and to assist the court in complying with the duty to monitor the progress of each abuse and neglect case from filing through the child's permanent placement, the court shall promptly enter required data into the electronic child abuse and neglect database managed by the Administrator of the Supreme Court of Appeals for each abuse/neglect case commencing from the filing of the case until the child involved in the case is situated by way of unconditional permanent return to parent(s), or other permanent placement ratified by court order, or by emancipation.

Rule 54. Transitioning Adults

These rules of procedure pertaining to case reviews and permanency hearings apply to any "transitioning adult" as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-202.

APPENDIX A: Guidelines for Children's Guardians

Ad Litem in Child Abuse and Neglect Cases

Introduction

The purpose of the following Guidelines is to provide guardians ad litem (GAL) with guidance in representing a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding under W.Va. Code § 49-4-601, et seq. The Guidelines are divided into five parts: 1) Section A sets forth the general role of a GAL and the education and training requirements of a GAL; 2) Section B discusses ethical considerations in representation; 3) Section C describes the duties of a GAL as to the initial stages of representation; 4) Section D discusses the duties of a GAL as to the adjudicatory and dispositional stages of representation; and 5) Section E describes the duties of a GAL as to post-dispositional representation.

A. Role of GAL; Education and Training

1. Role of GAL. The GAL in a child abuse and neglect case has a dual role, both as an attorney, and to represent the best interests of the child. A GAL has broad discretion in determining what is necessary to protect the best interests of a child. The safety, well-being, and timely permanent placement of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding are central to all aspects of a GAL's representation.

2. Education and Training. An attorney appointed as GAL shall complete a minimum of eight (8) hours of continuing legal education training every two years in child abuse and neglect practice and procedure as provided by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

B. Ethical Considerations in Representation

1. Rules of Professional Conduct. The Rules of Professional Conduct apply to a GAL's representation of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding.

2. Duty of Confidentiality. A GAL owes a duty of confidentiality to the child, but this duty is not absolute. A GAL has a duty to disclose a child's confidential communication to the court when the communication implicates a high risk of probable harm to the child.

3. Conflicts of Interest. General principles of conflicts of interest apply to a GAL's representation of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding. Conflicts of interest commonly arising in abuse and neglect proceedings include the following:

1. A GAL determines that there is a conflict of interest in performing both roles as GAL and the child's attorney. In such instance, the lawyer should continue to represent the child as the child's attorney and withdraw as GAL. The lawyer should simultaneously ask the court to appoint a new GAL to represent the best interests of the child. A mere disagreement regarding the best interests of the child does not in itself constitute a basis for withdrawing as counsel.

2. A conflict of interest arises when siblings represented by the same GAL have opposing interests. If the GAL discovers the conflict before commencing representation of the siblings, the GAL shall only accept appointment of one sibling or non-conflicting siblings. If the GAL discovers the conflict of interest after accepting appointment to represent the siblings, the GAL shall request that the court appoint a new GAL to represent the interests of the conflicting sibling or siblings.

3. A conflict of interest arises when a GAL subsequently represents a child's parent, relative, caregiver, foster parent, or pre-adoptive parent in another matter. In such instance, a GAL should not engage in a subsequent representation that compromises the GAL's ability to independently consider the best interests of the child.

C. Duties of GAL as to Initial Stages of Representation

1. When appropriate, promptly notify the child and the child's caretaker of the GAL's appointment and the means by which counsel can be contacted.

2. When appropriate, initiate contact with the caseworker, review the caseworker's file and obtain copies of school, medical, social service, or other records necessary to thoroughly understand and investigate the case.

3. Schedule a face-to-face meeting with the child at a time and place that allows for observation and private consultation with the GAL unless the court specifically determines that such a meeting would be inappropriate given the age, medical and/or psychological condition of the child.

4. When appropriate, counsel the child regarding the subject matter of the proceedings, the specific reasons for the GAL's appointment and the expectations of the court.

5. When a Court Appointed Special Advocate (CASA) has been appointed to the case, work with the CASA volunteer to achieve the goal of representing the best interests of the child.

6. Conduct an independent investigation of the facts of the case.

1. When appropriate, conduct in-home visits during which the GAL can observe the respective living environments of the child's parents or caretakers and their interaction with the child.

2. When appropriate, interview caregivers, caseworkers, therapists, school personnel, medical providers, relatives, siblings, and/or other individuals that have pertinent information regarding the child.

3. Ascertain the child's wishes when possible.

7. Maintain contact with the child throughout the case to monitor whether the child is receiving counseling, tutoring, or any other services needed to provide as much support as possible under the circumstances.

8. When appropriate, keep the child apprised of any developments in the case and actions of the court or parties involved.

D. Duties of GAL as to Adjudicatory and Dispositional Stages of Representations

1. Actively participate in all aspects of litigation, including, but not limited to, discovery, motions practice, court appearances, and the presentation of evidence.

2. Maintain adequate records of documents filed in the case and of all conversations with the child and potential witnesses.

3. When appropriate, evaluate any available improvement periods and actively assist in the formulation of an improvement period and service plans. The GAL is to monitor the status of the child and progress of the parent(s) in satisfying the conditions of the improvement period by requiring updates or status reports from agencies involved with the family.

4. Assess whether it is appropriate for the child to participate in court hearings or multi-disciplinary team meetings. The GAL is to participate in any discussions regarding the proposed testimony of the child and, if it is determined that the child's testimony is necessary, strongly advocate for the testimony to be taken in an acceptable and emotionally neutral setting.

5. Assess whether it is appropriate for the child to undergo multiple physical or psychological examinations. Before multiple physical or psychological examinations are conducted, the requesting party must present to the judge evidence of a compelling need or reason considering: (1) the nature and intrusiveness of the examination requested; (2) the child's age; (3) the resulting physical and/or emotional effects of the examination on the child; (4) the probative value of the examination to the issues before the court; (5) whether the passage of time renders the examination unnecessary or irrelevant; and (6) the evidence already available for the respondent's use.

6. Review any pre-dispositional report prepared for the court prior to the dispositional hearing and submit a factually accurate report if necessary to correct deficiencies.

7. Complete the investigation of the case with sufficient time between the interviews and court appearances to thoroughly analyze the information gleaned to formulate meaningful arguments and written recommendations to the court.

8. Submit a written report to the court and provide a copy to all parties at least five (5) days prior to the disposition hearing that complies with the format and content requirements of the "Report of Guardian Ad Litem" set forth in Appendix B of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. When necessary, petition the court to seal or redact information contained in the report as provided in Rule 18a of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. Submit an updated report if necessary to notify the court of any changes in the child's circumstances. Such report is protected by the attorney-client privilege and the attorney work product privilege. GALs are precluded from testifying as to any aspect of the report.

9. When appropriate, explain to the child the decisions of the court.

10. Ensure that the child/family case plan and subsequent progress reports include appropriate treatment. The GAL is to advocate, when appropriate, for a gradual transition period and take into consideration the educational stability of the child. The GAL is to ensure that the transition plan is intended to foster the child's emotional adjustment.

11. Recommend to the court the appropriateness of establishing, continuing, or collecting a child support obligation from the parents involved in the case.

12. Ensure that the court considers whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests.

13. Ensure that the dispositional order contains provisions that direct the child protective agency to provide periodic reviews and reports to appropriate entities.

E. Duties of GAL as to Post-Dispositional Representation

1. When appropriate, explain to the child the decisions of the court.

2. When appropriate, inform the child of the right to appeal and what that right means. Exercise the appellate rights of the child if under the reasonable judgment of the GAL an appeal is necessary. If the GAL decides to file an appeal, the appeal must fully comply with the requirements set forth in Rule 11 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure.

3. Actively participate and timely file a response in any appeal, extraordinary writ, modification, or action ancillary to the abuse and neglect proceeding including proceedings to address the disruption of a permanent placement which affect the recommendations of the GAL. If an appeal is filed by another party in an abuse and neglect case, the GAL is required to file a respondent's brief or summary response that adheres to the requisite provisions of Rule 11 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure.

4. During the period of representation, evaluate whether it is appropriate to file a motion for modification of the dispositional order if a change in circumstances occurs for the child which warrants a modification.

5. As provided in Rule 52(g) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, a GAL's representation of the child continues until such time as permanent placement of the child has been achieved, or as determined by the Court.

(Signature of Guardian Ad Litem) (Date)

DIRECTIONS ON COMPLETING REPORT OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM

The following directions provide guidance to guardians ad litem (GAL) in preparing a report in an abuse and neglect proceeding pursuant to Rule 18a of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. A GAL must submit a written report to the court and provide a copy to all parties at least five (5) days prior to the disposition hearing. It is the duty of the GAL to determine if the information contained in the report should be sealed or redacted. The GAL is to submit an updated report if necessary to notify the court of any changes in the child's circumstances. The contents of each section and subsection of the report are discussed below.

I. General Information

This section is intended to provide general information regarding the parties involved in the abuse and neglect petition including the following:

1. Child's full name and date of birth;

2. Parents' full names;

3. If applicable, the names and ages of any siblings or half-siblings; information regarding the sibling's parents, and the sibling's current placement.

4. Provide the names of any other parties involved in the abuse and neglect petition such as step-parents, relatives, or a parent's boyfriend or girlfriend. If the child is currently in foster care, list the names of foster parents and any other individuals residing in the child's current placement.

II. History

Briefly describe the procedural posture of the case. Did a parent or parents voluntarily relinquish rights to any other children? Have parental rights been involuntarily terminated to any other children of either parent previously? If so, provide the date, case number, and facts with regard to the previous relinquishment. It is the duty of the GAL to determine what parental information is pertinent to a decision regarding the welfare of the child or children involved in the petition. What circumstances led to the filing of the instant petition? What essential issues need to be addressed by the Court in this proceeding?

III. GAL'S Contact with Child

Indicate the dates of contact with the child, the purpose of the contact, and the duration of the visit. Was the child alone during the visit? If not, who was present? Did the GAL conduct in-home visits and observe the respective living environments of the child's parents or caretakers and their interaction with the child?

IV. Persons Interviewed

List the name of each person interviewed and their relationship to the child. Such persons may include parents or caregivers, caseworkers, therapists, school personnel, medical providers, relatives, and siblings. Also list the date and manner in which the interviews were conducted (e.g., by phone, in person).

V. Summary of Information Obtained from Interviews/Observations

Provide an objective summary of the information obtained from the interviews and observations obtained from the investigation. Observations may include information regarding the parties' respective living environments, the child's behavior, and the child's interaction with parents, siblings, relatives, peers or others.

VI. Summary of Documents Reviewed

List and summarize the documents reviewed during the course of the investigation. Documents may include medical records, school records, police reports, psychological reports, psychiatric reports, and other documents. Attach any necessary documents.

VII. Child's Current Status

Provide the court with information regarding the current status of the child including information regarding the child's placement, visitation, education, medical needs, services, and contact with siblings and relatives.

1. Placement. Describe any observations regarding the child's current placement. Is this environment satisfying the needs of the child? What are the plans for the child's permanency?

2. Visitation. What is the status of parental visitation? Are the child's needs being met with regard to visitation?

3. Education. What is the child's current grade level? What school does the child attend? What are the child's current grades? What is the child's attendance record? Does the child have any special needs that need to be addressed?

4. Medical. Does the child have any medical needs that need to be addressed?

5. Services. Does the child need counseling, tutoring, or any other types of services?

6. Contact with Siblings/Relatives. Are the child's needs being met with regard to contact with siblings and/or relatives?

VIII. Parents' Current Situation

Provide information regarding the fitness of each of the parents and their ability to care for the child including: the parents' work schedules/time available to spend with the child; parents' educational levels: financial resources: family support: home studies/living arrangements; domestic violence issues; substance abuse problems; criminal history; medical, emotional or psychological matters; and the parents' compliance with services and court orders. Include any other information that the GAL determines is pertinent to a decision regarding the welfare of the child or children involved in the petition.

IX. Child's Expressed Wishes

Discuss the child's wishes when appropriate and any issues that the child requests the court to consider.

X. Recommendation

Analyze the factors that are essential for the court to consider when making a determination regarding the allegations of abuse and neglect and custody, visitation, and permanent placement of the child. Discuss the child's case plan as well as the family case plan including the services to be made available to the child and family. Address any other issues that are necessary in order for the court to protect the best interests of the child.

XI. Conclusion

Summarize the most important factors for the court to consider in making its decision, noting all aspects requiring special court direction and indicate any other action that is necessary to further the best interests of the child.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS

In Re: A.N.

Nos. 15-0182 & 15-0208 (Mingo County 13-JA-89)

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

MEMORANDUM DECISION

In these two abuse and neglect appeals, the Court issued a Rule to Show Cause against the guardian ad litem, Lauren Thompson, ("Ms. Thompson") to explain why she should not be held in contempt, denied eligibility for guardian ad litem appointments, and subjected to further sanctions after failing to comply with the scheduling orders mandated by this Court. This memorandum decision does not address the merits of the abuse and neglect appeals. It addresses only the Rule to Show Cause in contempt against Ms. Thompson, the guardian ad litem for the child who is the subject of these appeals. Based upon her untimely filing of the response briefs, we find her in contempt. Considering the sanctions to be imposed, Ms. Thompson is hereby denied eligibility for guardian ad litem and any other court appointments until the Office of Disciplinary Counsel's investigation into this matter and any resulting disciplinary action is fully concluded.

Case No. 15-0182 involves the petitioner father's appeal of the termination of his parental rights. Case No. 15-0208 involves the petitioner mother's appeal of the termination of her parental rights. By orders entered on April 16, 2015, in Case No. 15-0182 and March 13, 2015, in Case No. 15-0208, Ms. Thompson was directed to file a respondent's brief or summary response on or before May 20, 2015. Ms. Thompson failed to file the response briefs by the May 20, 2015, deadline.[1]

Accordingly, Notices of Intent to Sanction and Amended Scheduling Orders were entered on May 27, 2015, and by those orders, Ms. Thompson was directed to file the response briefs on or before June 1, 2015. Counsel was reminded that failure to file the response briefs could result in sanctions being imposed under Rule 10(j) of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure. Again, the response briefs were not filed by the June 1, 2015, deadline.[2]

[1]On May 22, 2015, the West Virginia Supreme Court's Clerk's Office ("Clerk's Office") called Ms. Thompson and left a message with her office assistant that the response briefs were past due.

[2]The Clerk's Office contacted Ms. Thompson regarding the status of the late response briefs in an effort to receive the response briefs prior to the conclusion of the Court's 2015 Spring Term of Court. On June 5, 2015, the Clerk's Office sent Ms. Thompson an e-mail reminding her that the response briefs were past due. Ms. Thompson responded by e-mail on June 8, 2015, stating, "I have no idea what is going on. I am not scheduled to be in the office today but can make it back there by 2. My assistant left after the long weekend. I was unaware of any of this. I will figure out what has happened today." The Clerk's Office informed Ms.

By two separate orders entered on June 11, 2015, the Court issued a Rule to Show Cause against Ms. Thompson for failure to timely file the response briefs. The Court's orders entered on June 11, 2015, provided that the Rule to Show Cause was returnable at ten o'clock a.m., on Wednesday, September 2, 2015. The Court further directed Ms. Thompson to show cause why she should not be held in contempt of this Court, unless sooner mooted by the filing of the response briefs that fully complied with the Rules of Appellate Procedure.[3]

Despite having nearly three months to comply with the June 11, 2015, orders and despite receiving numerous reminders from the Clerk's Office,[4] Ms. Thompson did not submit her motion and response briefs until September 1, 2015, the day before oral argument on the Rule to Show Cause.[5] Ms. Thompson indicated in her motion that her response briefs were untimely filed due to a calendaring error and repeated staff changes in her office. Ms. Thompson further stated in her motion that the child currently awaits adoption by the child's foster parents, and the parties were not prejudiced by her late filings in these abuse and neglect cases.

By order entered on September 3, 2015, the Court, on its own motion, proceeded to review and consider the imposition of sanctions due to Ms. Thompson's untimely filings. The Court found that Ms. Thompson's justification for the untimely filing of the response briefs in Case Nos. 15-0182 and 15-0208 was unsatisfactory. The Court emphasized that abuse and neglect cases must be considered as expeditiously as possible in order to ensure the timely permanency for the child. The Court issued a second Rule to Show Cause against Ms. Thompson, ordering her to appear at ten o'clock a.m. on Wednesday, September 16, 2015, and to show cause why she should not be held in contempt, denied eligibility for future guardian ad litem appointments, and subjected to further sanctions due to the untimely filings. Ms. Thompson was ordered to file a written response to the second Rule to Show Cause on or before September 9, 2015.[6]

On September 10, 2015, Ms. Thompson submitted a response to the September 3, 2015, order. In her response, she admitted that the reasons supplied in her earlier motion did not "fully Thompson by e-mail on June 8, 2015, that she could submit her response briefs by facsimile, together with a motion to file the response briefs out-of-time.

[3]Ms. Thompson personally signed the return receipt confirmation on June 17, 2015, indicating that she received the June 11, 2015, orders.

[4]Telephone messages were left with Ms. Thompson's assistant, "Misty," on July 23, 2015, at 10:54 a.m.; August 14, 2015, at 1:29 p.m.; and August 31, 2015, at 10:30 a.m. Additionally, the Clerk's Office sent Ms. Thompson an e-mail on August 7, 2015, reminding her of her obligation to file response briefs in these matters.

[5]The documents were submitted by facsimile.

[6]The order further provided that the written response did not negate Ms. Thompson's obligation to appear before the Court.

explain the reason behind the failure to file a timely response ….” She articulated two reasons for the delay. First, she cited “action and inaction” by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (“DHHR”) and its failure to act in accordance with federal guidelines. Ms. Thompson attached her own affidavit in which she detailed her attempts to complain to local officials about staff shortages and “turmoil” at the DHHR. The affidavit included a statement explaining her decision not to file timely response briefs:

> I have spoken to Judge Cummings about the issue. I have spoken with the family of A.N. about these proceedings and my decision not to timely file a response. I have proffered repeatedly about the issues and my decision not to comply in hopes of bringing the issue to this Court. It may seem like foot-stomping and whining but that’s better than the alternative of turning a blind eye. If I did not try to do something then I am failing at my duties. I have been advised that this is not an appropriate means to obtain relief but in the same conversation I have been advised that there is no means to obtain relief. And I find that unacceptable. I lay this issue before the Court and pray there are means to explore the issue and fix it.

Second, she argued that the job of a guardian ad litem is difficult enough without having to deal with an appeal filed on behalf of “disinterested parties.” Ms. Thompson argued that “filers should be required to show that the Petitioners are active, willing participants in their appeal.” She further stated that she “did not foresee any potential damage to the child resulting from her refusal to file a timely response in this matter.”

The Court notes that at no time during the oral argument held in this matter did Ms. Thompson take responsibility for her failure to timely file the response briefs, which resulted in delaying the permanency for the child by at least four months. Following the oral argument in this matter, on September 17, 2015, Ms. Thompson submitted a statement to the Court wherein she asserted as follows: “In retrospect, it was just a missed deadline which could possibly have been quickly cured. But at the time, in my mind it became an inevitability and the only opportunity I would have to talk about very serious problems that were occurring.” (Emphasis in original.) She emphasized that her former office assistant failed to inform her of receipt of the Notices of Intent to Sanction and Amended Scheduling Orders entered on May 27, 2015, and she was not aware of this issue until June 8, 2015, when she received an e-mail from the Clerk’s Office reminding her to file the response briefs in the underlying abuse and neglect cases. She further indicated that it was not until after the oral argument in this matter that she realized how the Court viewed her conduct in failing to timely file the response briefs. Rather, Ms. Thompson stated that she believes that she “excel[s]” in oral argument and that “[o]nce [she] realized how things had been interpreted [by the Court,] it became an out of body experience.”

Having reviewed Ms. Thompson’s responses to the September 3, 2015, order and having heard her oral argument in this matter, we find that Ms. Thompson failed to provide sufficient justification for filing the response briefs in an untimely manner.[7] Despite having nearly three months of notice to comply with the Court's orders, and despite repeated communications from the Clerk's Office reminding her of the deadlines, Ms. Thompson's response briefs, which were originally due on May 20, 2015, were not filed until September 1, 2015. Ms. Thompson indicated that she was not aware of the Court's orders until June 8, 2015. Still, at that point, Ms. Thompson could have filed her response briefs before September 1, 2015.

Ms. Thompson's excuse regarding the DHHR's alleged shortcomings in no way mitigates or justifies her failure to comply with this Court's orders. Although Ms. Thompson argued that her intentional delay was the "only way" to remedy her perception that government officials were not carrying out their duties, she could have pursued other remedies. For example, a writ of mandamus is a proper means of relief to require the performance of nondiscretionary legal duties by government bodies. State ex rel. Allstate Ins. Co. v. Union Pub. Serv. Dist., 151 W.Va. 207, 151 S.E.2d 102 (1966). See e.g. Hensley v. WV Dep't of Health and Human Res., 203 W.Va. 456, 508 S.E.2d 616 (1998) (granting writ of mandamus to compel DHHR to comply with grievance decisions awarding back pay and prejudgment interest).

Most troubling to the Court is Ms. Thompson's lack of concern for the child she represents and the need for permanency in the child's life. We reiterate the importance of full participation of the guardian ad litem in appellate proceedings. See In Re: B.L., G.W., and I.W., No. 14-0660 and In Re: N.K. and K.K., No. 14-0714 (W.Va. Supreme Court, June 10, 2015) (memorandum decision) ("[w]e wish to re-emphasize how vitally important it is for guardians ad litem to comply with Rule 11(h) of the Rules of Appellate Procedure and this Court's orders in a timely fashion so that abuse and neglect appeals can be promptly and efficiently resolved.").

Accordingly, the Court hereby orders that Ms. Thompson be, and hereby is, held in contempt for her willful violations of the orders of this Court. The Court hereby directs the Clerk of this Court to refer this matter to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel for further review[8] and any resulting disciplinary action. Ms. Thompson is hereby denied eligibility for guardian ad litem and any other court appointments until the Office of Disciplinary Counsel's investigation into this matter and any resulting disciplinary action is fully concluded. The Clerk is further directed to provide notice of this sanction to the circuit courts in each county where Ms. Thompson routinely practices.

Sanctions Imposed.

[8]When this Court believes a case before it presents the appearance of conduct that does not comport with the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, Canon 3D(2) of the West Virginia Code of Judicial Conduct requires that we refer the matter to the Office of Disciplinary Counsel for its review and appropriate action. See Syl. Pt. 8, Gum v. Dudley, 202 W.Va. 477, 505 S.E.2d 391 (1997). To be clear, by making this referral we express no opinion as to whether disciplinary proceedings ultimately should be initiated or how such proceedings should be resolved. It is for the Office of Disciplinary Counsel to determine whether, and/or how, to proceed after it has reviewed this matter.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to a de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirely." Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interest of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child." Syl. pt. 4, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005).

3. By specifying in W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances. Syl. pt. 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by the petitioner Robert H.[1] from an order of the Circuit Court of Mercer County placing his grandson, Aaron H. Jr., a child under the age of 18 years, in the home of his foster parents, Alice N. and Gerald N., for the purpose of adoption. The petitioner contends that he should have been considered as an adoptive placement for Aaron H. Jr. For the reasons discussed herein, we affirm the ruling of the Circuit Court of Mercer County that ordered that the child be placed for adoption in the home of the foster parents.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Aaron H. Jr., born December 7, 2007, is the biological child of Jennifer J. and Aaron H. Aaron H. Jr. was the subject of a petition filed in the Circuit Court of Mercer County by the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "the Department") alleging that he was an abused and/or neglected child. At that time Aaron H. was in the custody of neither biological parent, but instead, with a woman named Diana R. The initial petition alleged that the child had suffered from physical abuse, that his caregiver Diana R. had failed to obtain medical treatment for him and had engaged in other neglectful behaviors. The petition was later amended to include the child's biological parents, Aaron H. and Jennifer J., as respondents. Aaron H. was incarcerated in another state during all times pertinent to this proceeding. The allegations against Jennifer J. included a prior court proceeding in which she lost custody of two other children born prior to Aaron H.

During the course of the proceeding giving rise to this appeal, Diana R. voluntarily relinquished any rights she had to the custody of Aaron H. While she participated in an improvement period, the child's mother, Jennifer J., ultimately voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to the child. The circuit court terminated Aaron H.'s parental rights.

The child has resided in the home of his foster parents, Alice N. and Gerald N., since the filing of the initial petition. At the time initial petition was filed, the child was approximately 18 months old. At the time of the permanency hearing the child was almost four years old and is now almost five years of age. The foster parents have long expressed their desire to adopt Aaron H.

Robert H. (hereinafter "petitioner") is the paternal grandfather of Aaron H. Jr. His involvement in the instant proceedings began well after the initial petition was filed and was limited to being considered as a possible adoptive home for Aaron H. Jr.

once the parental rights of Jennifer J. and Aaron H. were terminated. The petitioner did not have a relationship with Aaron H. Jr. prior to the abuse and neglect proceeding.[2] The circuit court reviewed the request and ordered that a home study be performed on the home of Robert H. in recognition of the statutory preference for relative adoptions contained in W. Va. Code § 49-3-1 (2007). At the time of the entry of the order granting the petitioner a home study, he was staying with his sister in Indiana. The Department implemented the provisions of the Interstate Compact for the Placement of Children (hereinafter "the Compact") and requested that the State of Indiana perform a home study of the residence of Robert H. This request was received by Indiana in February of 2011. The child remained in the care of his foster parents.

The sole issue before the circuit court was the permanent placement of Aaron H. Jr. At the permanency hearing before the circuit court, Megan Shell, a foster care specialist from the State of Indiana, testified about her work on the home study. She testified that the State of Indiana has a strict 60-day time period in which to complete a home study requested through the Compact. She first met with the petitioner on March 4, 2011. At that time the petitioner was asked to complete some paperwork and to gather up documents, including copies of his birth certificate, driver's license, marriage and divorce records and other items. These documents were received sometime toward the end of April, which would have been after the end of the 60-day time period in which the report had to be completed. Ms. Shell testified that the petitioner was told of the need for expediency in returning these documents, as well of the time constraints.

Ms. Shell also testified that while the home study was pending, the petitioner changed his mind about where he wanted to live. While he was residing in the home of his sister in Indiana, he contemplated living in an apartment in Kentucky. He later changed his mind about that. As a result of the petitioner's varying residential intentions, Ms. Shell was never able to visit any home of the petitioner because by the time the petitioner completed and returned the initial paperwork, the 60-day period for completion of the home study had elapsed. Ms. Shell then sent to the Department a letter indicating that the petitioner had not successfully completed his home study but that additional time could be requested by West Virginia by submitting another request. No follow-up request was ever received by the State of Indiana.

Also testifying at the permanency hearing was a representative from the Department who had received the correspondence from Indiana regarding the petitioner's home study. This representative, Chris Bell, testified that he received a four-page facsimile transmission (hereinafter "fax") from Indiana about this home study. On the first page of the fax was a section that contained three possible choices for the home study: under consideration, approved or denied. The fax from Indiana was marked "denied." Based upon his review of only the first page of the fax, Mr. Bell stated that he recommended that Aaron H. be adopted by his foster parents. Some time elapsed before

Mr. Bell read the remainder of the fax, which included information that the home study was denied because there was not any more time in which to complete the evaluation after 60 days passed. He likewise did not request additional time in which to allow Indiana to complete the home study. At the hearing, Mr. Bell testified that he "saw no point in delaying permanency for this child."

The petitioner testified at the permanency hearing about the difficulties he had in complying with the requests of Indiana regarding documentation of life events. He stated that divorce records were available in Indianapolis, but because the divorce records were older, they were only available on microfilm. He testified that he would have had to take a bus to Indianapolis to retrieve those records. Likewise, retrieving records regarding his arrest, which happened decades ago, was impossible because the records had been destroyed.

At the conclusion of the permanency hearing, the circuit court granted the request of the Department to place Aaron H. Jr. in the home of his foster parents, Alice and Gerald N. The circuit court found that the petitioner did not successfully complete his home study, and thus, was not a suitable placement for the child. The circuit court found that the actions of the Department were 'appalling" in that it had not requested additional time in which to complete the petitioner's home study, but further found that Aaron H. Jr. had lived two-thirds of his young life with his foster parents and that it was not in his best interests to be removed from that household.

The petitioner filed the instant appeal, seeking to be named as the adoptive home for Aaron H. Jr.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The issue presented in this appeal focuses on the preference afforded grandparents to adopt their grandchildren after the parental rights of the grandchildren have been terminated through an abuse and neglect proceeding pursuant to W. Va. Code 49-6-1 (2007). Our standard of review in abuse and neglect matters is as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to a de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirely.

Syllabus point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

With this standard in mind we proceed to the merits of the petitioner's appeal.

III.

ANALYSIS

As noted, the sole issue before this Court in this abuse and neglect proceeding is whether, with respect to the permanent placement of the child, the circuit court erred in placing the child with his foster parents for adoption rather than with his grandfather in view of the statutory preference for grandparent placement contained in W. Va. Code 49-3-1 (2007).[3] The grandparent preference statute states, > [f]or purposes of any placement of a child for adoption by the department, the department shall first consider the suitability and willingness of any known grandparent or grandparents to adopt the child. Once any such grandparents who are interested in adopting the child have been identified, the department shall conduct a home study evaluation, including home visits and individual interviews by a licensed social worker. If the department determines, based upon the home study evaluation, that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents, it shall assure that the grandparents are offered the placement of the child prior to the consideration of any other prospective adoptive parents.

This Court has previously addressed this statutory preference in the case of In re Napoleon S., 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005). We held that placement with [3] The grandparent preference is also contained in the Department's internal regulations, specifically DHHR Adoption Policy § 7.3, which states, in part, that a grandparent or an adult relative with a positive home study certifying the home adoption must be given preference over the non-relative home even if the non-relative home has the appearance of a better placement choice. This policy is more fully discussed in Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 227 W. Va. 184, 706 S.E.2d 381 (2011).

a grandparent of a child whose parents' parental rights have been terminated is presumptively in the best interests of that child. Therein, we held,

> West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child whose parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child.

Syl. pt. 4, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005). Such a preference, however, necessarily implies that the home of the prospective adoptive grandparent be a fit and suitable one.

> By specifying in W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances.

Id. at Syl. pt. 5.

In the recent case of In re Elizabeth F., 225 W. Va. 780, 696 S.E.2d 296 (2010), we recently addressed whether the grandparent preference creates an absolute or unrebuttable presumption. In that case, the children were placed in the adoptive home of their maternal grandmother, despite some issues with the grandmother's home. The circuit court approved the placement of Elizabeth F. and her sister in this grandmother's home, but noted its hesitation in the order when it stated that "[a]bsent the grandparent preference, the Court doubts that his decision would be the same." Id. at 786, 696 S.E.2d at 300. This Court reversed the circuit court, reiterating that the best interests the child must always be considered. We stated that > [o]ur prior holdings in Napoleon are critically important insofar as we explicitly recognized that a crucial component of the grandparent preference is that the adoptive placement of the subject child with his/her grandparents must serve the child's best interests. Absent such a finding, adoptive placement with the child's grandparents is not proper.

Id. Therefore, the grandparent preference must be tempered by a court's consideration of the child's best interests. If on balance, the grandparent placement fails to serve the best interests of the child, the child may be placed elsewhere. We believe this is one such case.

Reviewing the entire record, we find that the current case does not turn simply on whether there was an unsuccessfully completed home study caused by the Department's failure to read through a fax. There is more. First, we simply cannot ignore the lack of contact between the petitioner and his grandchild, both prior to the child coming into the Department's custody and during the pendency of this proceeding. Furthermore, responsibility for the inability of Indiana to complete the petitioner's home study must be borne in part by the petitioner. While he may have had difficulty in obtaining certain records, the petitioner never stated with sufficient specificity where it was that he intended to reside with the child. Without a specific address, there was no way for anyone to visit the intended home. In addition, there was sufficient evidence that the petitioner's seeming transient nature, all while awaiting a home study, supported the perception of the Department that the petitioner did not successfully complete his home study. Finally, the petitioner himself did not request an extension of time in which to complete the report, even after the time considerations were explained to him by the Indiana social workers.

While we believe that the petitioner is sincere in his desire to undertake the responsibility for raising his grandson, which is commendable, we cannot ignore the totality of the record. The circuit court weighed all of these factors, and while it found fault with the Department for not reading through all of the fax from Indiana, it ultimately weighed all of the factors in consideration of the child's best interests and found that such interests would not be furthered by an adoption by the petitioner. We find no error in the circuit court's reasoning or conclusions.

IV.

CONCLUSION

While the failure of the Department to ensure that the petitioner received a completed home study is problematic, we cannot conclude that the circuit court erred in approving the adoption of Aaron H. Jr. by his foster parents. The circuit court's decision was not based solely on the lack of a completed home study but on other factors, including the length and quality of time the child has lived in the home of Alice and Gerald N. For the foregoing reasons, the September 28, 2011, order of the Circuit Court of Mercer County is hereby affirmed.

SYLLABUS

"A writ of mandamus will not issue unless three elements coexist--(1) a clear legal right in the petitioner to the relief sought; (2) a legal duty on the part of respondent to do the thing which the petitioner seeks to compel; and (3) the absence of another adequate remedy." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Kucera v. City of Wheeling, 153 W.Va. 538, 170 S.E.2d 367 (1969).

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon a petition for a writ of mandamus filed by the petitioners, Aaron M.[1] and Anthony H., against the respondent, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"). The petitioners seek an order to compel the DHHR to pay for the therapeutic services of Denise Flint, a specialist in attachment disorders. We issued a rule to show cause, and now, for the reasons set forth below, grant the writ as moulded.

I.

On September 15, 1994, the Circuit Court of Hancock County determined that Aaron M., born on July 10, 1990, and Anthony H., born on January 15, 1992, were abused and neglected children. Subsequently, the court terminated the parental rights of their mother, Retha M., and granted permanent custody of the children to their maternal grandmother, Monica C. The court further ordered the DHHR to provide medical care, treatment, and services for the physical, emotional, and psychological needs of the children.

Since 1995, the children's placement has been reviewed by the circuit court every six months. Because of the abuse and neglect suffered by the children while in their mother's care, they have received therapy from Wellspring Family Services (hereinafter "Wellspring"). These services were paid through the children's Medicaid card. In 1998, the children's therapist at Wellspring advised the children's Multidisciplinary Treatment Team (hereinafter "MTT") that she did not believe that she had sufficient expertise to provide appropriate therapy for the children. Anthony had been hospitalized in November 1997, at a psychiatric facility for children in St. Clairsville, Ohio, after starting a fire in his grandmother's home. He was diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, fetal alcohol syndrome, depression, sexual abuse as a child, pyromania, and attachment disorder. Aaron was demonstrating similar, but less severe, problems. Given the therapist's concern, the MTT determined that Anthony should be evaluated by Denise Flint, a child therapist with Coddington & Associates, who was known to have expertise in attachment disorders.

In a report dated September 10, 1999, Ms. Flint advised that Anthony had serious problems and that she agreed with the prior diagnoses of reactive attachment disorder, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, and fetal alcohol syndrome. Ms. Flint recommended that Anthony work with her for two hours, biweekly, to resolve his past life trauma, grief, and loss. The MTT, which included at least two representatives of the DHHR, agreed with Ms. Flint's recommendation and a hearing was scheduled with the circuit court for approval.

At a hearing held on September 17, 1999, the circuit court reviewed Ms. Flint's report and the recommendation of the MTT. Thereafter, the circuit court ordered that Anthony receive therapy from Ms. Flint, biweekly, for two hours per session, at the rate of $75.00 per hour, and that the DHHR provide prompt and regular payments for her services.

In February 2000, the guardian ad litem for the children was informed by Ms. Flint's office that there was an outstanding bill for services rendered to Anthony in the amount of $2,522.50, and that they would have to cease treating him until the bill was paid. The guardian ad litem tried to resolve the matter but ultimately filed a motion for contempt against the DHHR on March 6, 2000. Prior to a hearing on the motion, the DHHR paid the bill and promised to provide prompt payment in the future. As a result, the motion for contempt was withdrawn.

A court review was held on March 24, 2000, and the guardian ad litem presented to the circuit court a report from Ms. Flint regarding Aaron. Ms. Flint diagnosed Aaron with post-traumatic stress disorder, attention deficit disorder, and reactive attachment disorder. The MTT recommended that Ms. Flint provide treatment to Aaron at the DHHR's expense. The court approved the therapy for Aaron on a biweekly basis, in two-hour sessions, at the rate of $90.00 per hour.

In August 2000, the guardian ad litem was again notified by Ms. Flint's office that Anthony's account was delinquent, this time in the amount of $1,530.00. The guardian ad litem contacted the DHHR regarding the bill and was informed that the DHHR would only pay Ms. Flint's bills at the Medicaid rate. Thereafter, the guardian ad litem filed this petition for a writ of mandamus with this Court on behalf of the petitioners.

II.

We begin our analysis of this case by noting that a "[a] writ of mandamus will not issue unless three elements coexist–(1) a clear legal right in the petitioner to the relief sought; (2) a legal duty on the part of respondent to do the thing which the petitioner seeks to compel; and (3) the absence of another adequate remedy." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Kucera v. City of Wheeling, 153 W.Va. 538, 170 S.E.2d 367 (1969). As set forth above, the petitioners request that this Court grant a writ of mandamus and order the DHHR to pay for the therapeutic services of Ms. Flint at the rates approved by the circuit court. However, the DHHR contends that Ms. Flint is not entitled to reimbursement in excess of the Medicaid rate for services she provided to Aaron and Anthony. We agree.

Documents submitted in this case indicate that Ms. Flint works out of the offices of R. Dean Coddington, M.D. & Associates, Inc. Dr. Coddington has executed an agreement with the DHHR to accept Medicaid rates for his services and thus, is an approved Medicaid provider. Dr. Coddington's Medicaid provider agreement states that: "The provider shall provide for the compliance of any subcontractors with applicable federal requirements and assurances."

With respect to payment for services rendered by a Medicaid provider, 42 C.F.R. § 447.15 (1985) states, in pertinent part:

> A State plan must provide that the Medicaid agency must limit participation in the Medicaid program to providers who accept, as payment in full, the amount paid by the agency plus any deductible, coinsurance or copayment required by the plan to be paid by the individual.

In accordance with this requirement, W.Va. Code § 16-29D-4 (1991) provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) Except in instances involving the delivery of health care services immediately needed to resolve an imminent life-threatening medical or surgical emergency, the agreement by a health care provider to deliver services to a beneficiary of any department or division of the state which participates in a plan or plans developed under section three [§ 16-29D-3] of this article shall be considered to also include an agreement by that health care provider:
>
> (2) To accept as payment in full for the delivery of such services the amount specified in plan or plans or as determined by the plan or plans. In such instances, the health care provider shall bill the division or department, or such other person specified in the plan or plans, directly for the services. The health care provider shall not bill the beneficiary or any other person on behalf of the beneficiary and, except for deductibles or other payments specified in the applicable plan or plans, the beneficiary shall not be personally liable for any of the charges, including any balance claimed by the provider to be owed as being the difference between that provider's charge or charges and the amount payable by the applicable department or divisions.

Thus, a Medicaid provider cannot bill another source for the difference between the allowable Medicaid rate and the provider's customary rate.

Although the parties disagree as to whether Ms. Flint is an employee of Coddington & Associates or an independent contractor, it is clear that Dr. Coddington's Medicaid provider agreement along with the applicable federal regulation and state statute cited above prohibit Ms. Flint from being paid for her services in excess of the Medicaid rate. Thus, this Court finds that the circuit court erred by ordering the DHHR to pay Ms. Flint for services at the rate of $75.00 per hour for Anthony and $90.00 per hour for Aaron.

Given the facts in this case, it is clear that the petitioners required the services of Ms. Flint. Moreover, the DHHR is required to provide such supportive services in abuse and neglect proceedings. W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 (1998). However, because Ms. Flint was working out of the offices of Dr. Coddington, a Medicaid provider, she is not entitled to payment for her services in excess of the Medicaid rate. Therefore, we grant the requested writ of mandamus, but direct the DHHR to pay Ms. Flint's invoices for therapeutic services rendered to the petitioners at the Medicaid rate applicable at the time the services were or are hereafter rendered.[2]

Writ granted as moulded.

[2]We note that the DHHR paid some of Ms. Flint's invoices in excess of the Medicaid rate applicable at the time the services were rendered. In satisfying Ms. Flint's unpaid invoices, the DHHR is entitled to a credit for those overpayments.

Per Curiam:

The appellant herein and respondent below, Christina L.[1], appeals from the January 8, 2002, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County terminating her parental rights to her minor children Aaron Thomas M., Delta Dawn M., and Luke Brian M. upon a finding of abuse and neglect. Before this Court, Christina L. asserts that the circuit court erred by (1) finding that she had used controlled substances in her children's presence; (2) concluding that her alleged use of controlled substances in her children's presence constituted abuse; (3) requiring her to testify during the adjudicatory hearing; and (4) terminating her parental rights. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the record submitted for appellate review, and the pertinent authorities, we affirm the ruling of the circuit court.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The facts upon which the circuit court based its decision are as follows. On June 14, 2001, the appellee herein and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter referred to as the "DHHR"], filed a petition in the Circuit

[1]"We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the parties rather than their full names." In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 26 n.1, 435 S.E.2d 162, 164 n.1 (1993).

Court of Wood County alleging that Aaron Thomas M.,[2] Delta Dawn M.,[3] and Luke Brian M.[4] were abused and/or neglected children pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2001).[5] In particular, the petition alleged fifteen counts of abuse and/or neglect by the children's mother, Christina L. Included in the petition was an allegation that on December 11, 2000, school officials confiscated a marijuana pipe from Aaron. It was further alleged that Aaron "effectively demonstrate[d] how to use, take apart, and clean the pipe." Aaron also stated that "sometimes his five-year-old sister smokes his mother's cigarettes when she doesn't know it." The petition additionally averred that Christina L. repeatedly tested positive for marijuana use and failed to attend or otherwise comply with various substance abuse rehabilitation programs, parenting classes, and counseling services, which the DHHR indicated were necessary to maintain custody of her children. Furthermore, a DHHR official observed Aaron ad Delta playing unsupervised in the street in front of their home. Finally, it was alleged that Aaron had approximately thirty-two unexcused absences from school during the 2000-01 academic year. The unexcused absences resulted in the filing of a truancy petition for [2]Aaron was seven years old at the time the subject petition was filed.

[3]Delta was five years old when the instant proceedings were initiated.

[4]Luke was two years old when DHHR filed the abuse and neglect petition.

[5]Prior to the instant petition being filed, DHHR had previously been involved with Christina L. During the adjudicatory hearing in this case there was testimony that DHHR tried to work with Christina L. in 1999. During that time Christina L. was referred for assistance with the Intensive Out-Patient Group, Positive Parenting and Recovery Group and Individual Therapy. As a result of Christina L.'s noncompliance with DHHR's initial efforts to stabilize her family, services to her were terminated in April of 2000.

educational neglect. By order entered June 14, 2001, the circuit court found the children to be in imminent danger and transferred them to the temporary custody of the DHHR pending further adjudication.

An adjudicatory hearing was held, after which the circuit court, on August 27, 2001, entered an order adjudicating the three children to be abused and/or neglected based upon the above-described allegations. Specifically, the court concluded that "not getting a seven year old child to school so that he can obtain a proper education is neglect" and "using a pipe enough times in the presence of a seven-year-old for him to acquire the information that this seven-year-old has acquired . . . is abuse." The circuit court further found that Christina L.'s continued "use of marijuana has affected the Respondent Mother's ability to supervise and care for these children and as a result they are abused and neglected children."

Following the adjudicatory hearing, the DHHR recommended, and the circuit court granted, on September 20, 2001, Christina L. a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. The terms of this improvement period required Christina L. to attend in-patient substance abuse treatment, Alcoholics Anonymous/Narcotics Anonymous meetings, outpatient counseling, and parenting classes; to report such attendance to the DHHR; to submit to random drug screens; to apply to HUD for housing assistance; to maintain adequate housing for the children; to cooperate with in-home services designed to improve her parenting skills; to attend GED classes in order to qualify for the West Virginia works program; to ensure the children go to school; and to sever her relationship with a certain Raymond J. if he does not, among other requirements, receive treatment and counseling for substance abuse and domestic violence. During this improvement period, Christina L. retained physical custody of her children. Upon Christina L.'s ultimate failure to comply with the terms of her improvement period, the circuit court, by order entered November 28, 2001, terminated such improvement period and transferred custody of the minor children to the DHHR.

Thereafter, a dispositional hearing was held, and, on January 8, 2002, the circuit court entered a dispositional order terminating Christina L.'s parental rights. In its order, the circuit court observed that Christina L. "exhibited a pattern of continued drug use . . . and a lack of cooperation to comply with any of the terms or conditions of the improvement period." The court further found that "the Respondent Mother is addicted to controlled substances or drugs to the extent that proper parenting skills have been impaired[,] and the Respondent Mother has not responded to or followed through with the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning." Accordingly, the circuit court finally concluded that, "pursuant to West Virginia Code, § 49-6-5(b), there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be corrected in the near future," and that "it is necessary for the welfare of the children to terminate the parental rights" of Christina L. From this dispositional order, Christina L. appeals to this Court.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In appeals of abuse and neglect cases we apply the following standard of review:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With this standard in mind, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

Before this Court, Christina L. raises four assignments of error: (1) the circuit court erred by finding that she had used controlled substances in her children's presence; (2) the circuit court improperly concluded that her alleged use of controlled substances in her children's presence constituted abuse; (3) the circuit court erroneously required her to testify during the adjudicatory hearing; and (4) the circuit court improperly terminated her parental rights. We will address each of these issues in turn.

A. Use of Controlled Substances in Children's Presence

Christina L. first complains that the circuit court erred by finding that there was clear and convincing evidence that she had used controlled substances in the presence of her children. This Court observed in Syllabus point 1, in part, of In re of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), that W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) requires DHHR, "in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.'" See Syl. pt. 3, State v. Julie G., 201 W. Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997). We made clear in Julie G. that "[t]he burden of proving that a child is abused or neglected is placed upon the DHHR." Julie G., 201 W. Va. at 774, 500 S.E.2d at 886.

The evidence relied upon by the trial court to find that Christina L. used drugs in the presence of her children came, in part, from statements made by Aaron, regarding the marijuana pipe found in his possession.[6] In its adjudicatory order, the circuit court found that the evidence established that "Aaron had been around the use of that pipe enough times to be able to demonstrate how to use it, take it apart and clean the pipe[.]" In addition, there was conclusive evidence that Christina L. had a drug problem.

[6]Christina L. asserted that the marijuana pipe in question was not hers, but belonged to a friend. However, Aaron indicated that the pipe belonged to his mother.

We agree with the trial court's determination that Aaron, at seven years old, could not learn how to take apart and clean a marijuana pipe, absent repeated exposure to this. In addition, the fact that Christina L. was a drug user leads to a reasonable inference that she repeatedly used the marijuana pipe in Aaron's presence, "if not all three of the children." In view of these facts, we have no difficulty in holding that the circuit court was not clearly erroneous in finding Christina L. used drugs in the presence of her children.

B. Use of Drugs in Children's Presence Constitutes Abuse

Christina L. next claims that the DHHR failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that her alleged use of controlled substances in front of her children caused physical, mental, or emotional injury to the children. We have previously noted that "W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a), in pertinent part, defines abused child to mean a child whose welfare or health is harmed or threatened by '[a] parent . . . who knowingly or intentionally inflicts . . . physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child[.]'" State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 566, 490 S.E.2d 642, 653 (1997).

The circuit court's adjudicatory order found that "using a pipe enough times in the presence of a seven-year-old for him to acquire the information that this seven-year-old has acquired . . . is abuse." The DHHR asserts that Christina L.'s substance abuse caused emotional injury to her children, evidenced, in part, by a statement Aaron made concerning whether his mother was still smoking. It was also pointed out by DHHR that one of the dispositive factors found in the termination of parental rights in W.V.D.H.H.R. ex rel. Mills v. Billy Lee C., 199 W. Va. 541, 545 n.2, 485 S.E.2d 710, 714 n.2 (1997), was that "both parents drank alcohol and smoked marijuana in the presence of the children." We believe that the circuit court was not clearly erroneous in finding the children were emotionally abused by Christina L.'s repeated drug use in their presence.

C. Requiring Christina L. to Testify under Immunity

Christina L. additionally argues that, despite her attempts to assert her constitutional right not to incriminate herself,[7] the circuit court nevertheless required her to answer a question during the adjudicatory hearing that she deemed self-incriminating. Christina L. asserts that the circuit court lacked the authority to grant her "use immunity"[8] for the purpose of compelling her to answer the question.

[7]"The Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination is not limited to the context of criminal trials but can be claimed in any proceeding, whether it is criminal or civil, administrative or judicial, investigatory or adjudicatory." Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Osburn v. Cole, 173 W. Va. 596, 319 S.E.2d 364 (1983).

[8]"Use immunity refers to an order of court that compels a witness to give self-incriminating testimony while at the same time prohibiting the use of such testimony in a subsequent prosecution of the witness. Use immunity protects a witness only against the actual use of the compelled testimony and evidence derived directly or indirectly from such testimony." State v. Simpson, 587 N.W.2d 770, 772 (Iowa 1998). See Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99, 117, 108 S. Ct. 2284, 2294-95, 101 L. Ed. 2d 98, 114 (1988) ("Testimony obtained pursuant to a grant of statutory use immunity may be used neither directly nor derivatively." (citations omitted)).

A review of the record indicates that the state asked Christina L. if Aaron had asked her if she was still smoking (marijuana). Defense counsel initially objected on the grounds that a response to the question would be self-incriminating. After the objection, the following exchange occurred between the attorneys and the court:

> The Court: Are you willing to offer her immunity in this case?
>
> The State: In regard to the behavior that I'm referring to from the incident yesterday, answering that question I'm not going to use that in future prosecution, no, Your Honor?
>
> The Court: Mr. Albright?
> Defense Counsel: I don't know that he spoke the magic words. But if the Court's going to grant immunity based on that, I'm sure that would overcome my objection.

The circuit court went on to grant Christina L. use immunity, and she answered the question by responding that she did tell Aaron she was still smoking. In this appeal, the State correctly points out that any error in requiring Christina L. to answer the question was invited and therefore waived. We agree.

The decisions of this Court have been quite clear in holding that "[a] judgment will not be reversed for any error in the record introduced by or invited by the party seeking reversal." Syl. pt. 21, State v. Riley, 151 W. Va. 364, 151 S.E.2d 308 (1966). See Syl. pt. 4, State v. Johnson, 197 W. Va. 575, 476 S.E.2d 522 (1996). That is, "[a] litigant may not . . . actively contribute to such error, and then raise that error as a reason for reversal on appeal."

Syl. pt 1, in part, Maples v. West Virginia Dep't. of Commerce, 197 W. Va. 318, 475 S.E.2d 410 (1996). In the instant case, defense counsel expressly approved of Christina L. waiving her right against self-incrimination, if the circuit court granted her immunity. Therefore, Christina L. cannot now complain on appeal that the circuit court did not have authority to grant her immunity.

We agree with Christina L. that no statutory authority existed for the trial court to grant her immunity in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding.[9] Further, for the sake of [9]The record is not clear, but it appears that the trial court relied upon W. Va. Code § 57-2-3 (1965) (Repl. Vol. 1997), as the source of authority to grant immunity. This statute states:

> In a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination.

Id. Christina L. correctly points out that we have held that "[t]he language of [the statute] addresses only the admissibility of a statement in court, and does not address a statement's possible 'use' for other purposes related to a criminal investigation or prosecution."State ex rel. Wright v. Stucky, 205 W. Va. 171, 174-75, 517 S.E.2d 36, 39-40 (1999), disapproved on other grounds, In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002).

The actual general immunity statute in this State is applicable only to testimony given in a criminal proceeding. See W. Va. Code § 57-5-2 (1923) (Repl. Vol. 1997) ("In any criminal proceeding no person shall be excused from testifying or from producing documentary or other evidence upon the ground that such testimony or evidence may criminate or tend to criminate him, if the court in which he is examined is of the opinion that the ends of justice may be promoted by compelling such testimony or evidence. And if, but for this section, the person would have been excused from so testifying or from producing such evidence, then if the person is so compelled to testify or produce other evidence and if such argument, had this issue been properly preserved we would deem the error harmless.[10] The testimony given by Christina L. merely affirmed that she made a statement to Aaron indicating that she was still smoking. The statement itself was introduced into evidence independent of Christina L.'s confirmation that it was made by her. Consequently, had there been no purported grant of immunity and Christina L. had not responded to the question, our cases permitted the circuit court to "consider . . . [her] silence as affirmative evidence of . . . culpability." Syl. pt. 2, in part, W.V.D.H.H.R. ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996). See also Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 318, 96 S. Ct. 1551, 1558, 47 L. Ed. 2d 810, 821 (1976) ("[T]he prevailing rule [is] that the Fifth Amendment does not forbid adverse inferences against parties to civil actions when they refuse to testify in response to probative evidence offered against them[.]").

testimony or evidence is self-criminating, such self-criminating testimony or evidence shall not be used or receivable in evidence against him in any proceeding against him thereafter taking place other than a prosecution for perjury in the giving of such evidence, and the person so compelled to testify or furnish evidence shall not be prosecuted for the offense in regard to which he is so compelled to testify or furnish evidence, and he shall have complete legal immunity in regard thereto." (emphasis added)). See also Syl. pt. 1, Committee on Legal Ethics of West Virginia State Bar v. Graziani, 157 W. Va. 167, 200 S.E.2d 353 (1973) ("It is generally held that immunity statutes apply only to criminal prosecutions.").

[10]The actual "harm" that could have resulted from this error would have arisen if the State brought a criminal action against Christina L., based upon her answer to the question in the abuse and neglect proceeding. If that had occurred, we would then have to determine whether such a criminal action could follow based upon an erroneous grant of immunity in the civil abuse and neglect proceeding. However, that specific issue is not before us.

D. Termination of Parental Rights

Christina L. lastly asserts that the circuit court's termination of her parental rights was improper. She contends that her use of marijuana and her failure to ensure one child's attendance at school during one school year do not amount to child abuse so as to require the termination of her parental rights. This Court has held that "[a]s a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child . . . will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened[.]" Syl. pt. 1, in part, In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). We have made clear that "[t]ermination of parental rights . . . may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(b) that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syl. pt. 2, in part, In re R. J. M. See In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 337, 540 S.E.2d 542, 553 (2000).

In the instant case, the circuit court found that the children were abused and that it was in their best interest to terminate Christina L.'s parental rights. The parental termination decision was made from a combination of evidentiary factors. For instance, the circuit court found that Christina L. "is addicted to controlled substances or drugs to the extent that proper parenting skills have been impaired[.]" It was found that Christina L. failed to "follow[] through with the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning." The circuit court also determined that Christina L. "has not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or rehabilitative efforts . . . designed to reduce and prevent the abuse and neglect of the children[.]" The DHHR correctly points out that under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(b) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001), drug abuse and failure to comply with a family case plan are grounds for terminating parental rights.[11] See

[11]The relevant provisions under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(b) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001) provide as follows:

> (b) As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
>
> (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such person or persons have not responded to or followed through [with] the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning;
>
> (2) The abusing parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the child's return to their care, custody and control;
> (3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or

In re of Micah Alyn R., 202 W. Va. 400, 406, 504 S.E.2d 635, 641 (1998) ("[I]f the abusing parent willfully refused or is presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a family case plan, a finding of 'no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected' under the statute is warranted."); Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 713, 356 S.E.2d 464, 467 (1987) ("[T]he legislature has stated expressly that the 'conditions of neglect or abuse' which constitute grounds for termination of parental rights include . . . '[t]he abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol . . . to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired[.]'"). Insofar as the evidence supported a statutory basis for terminating Christina L.'s parental rights, we affirm the trial court's decision.

CONCLUSION

The January 8, 2002, order of the Wood County Circuit Court terminating Christina L.'s parental rights in her minor children, Aaron Thomas M., Delta Dawn M., and Luke Brian M. is affirmed.

JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal." Syllabus point 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W. Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989).

2. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syllabus point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

3. "The primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syllabus point 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Compensation Commissioner, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975).

4. "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syllabus point 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951).

5. "This Court will use signed opinions when new points of law are announced and those points will be articulated through syllabus points as required by our state constitution." Syllabus point 2, Walker v. Doe, 210 W. Va. 490, 558 S.E.2d 290 (2001).

6. Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) (2006) (Supp. 2007), the circuit court or family court of the county in which a minor resides may appoint a suitable person to serve as the minor's guardian. In appointing a guardian, the court shall give priority to the minor's mother or father. "However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian." W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a).

7. Rule 48a(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court requires that if a family court presiding over a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 learns that the basis for the petition, in whole or in part, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court is required to remove the petition to circuit court for a hearing thereon. Furthermore, "[a]t the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence." West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court 48a(a).

8. "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts." Syllabus, Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960).

9. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syllabus point 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

10. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . in all family law matters . . . must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus point 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

11. "But the court is in no case bound to deliver the child into the custody of any claimant, but may leave it in such custody as the welfare of the child at the time appears to require." Syllabus point 4, Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 698, 14 S.E. 212 (1891).

12. "While courts always look to the best interests of the child in controversies concerning his or her custody, such custody should not be denied to a parent merely because some other person might possibly furnish the child a better home or better care." Syllabus point 3, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).

Davis, Justice:

The appellants herein and petitioners below, Gala P. (hereinafter "Gala")[1] and Brent P. (hereinafter "Brent"), appeal from an order entered July 9, 2007, by the Circuit Court of Cabell County. By that order, the circuit court denied the petitioners' request for guardianship of their minor grandchild, Abbigail Faye B. (hereinafter "Abbigail"), and returned the child's custody to her biological parents, Autumn S. B. (hereinafter "Autumn") and Josh B. (hereinafter "Josh"). On appeal to this Court, Gala and Brent contend that the circuit court erred by concluding that they had failed to meet their burden of proving that (1) Abbigail was abused or neglected and that (2) Autumn was not capable of being a fit parent. The appellants argue further that the circuit court's order denying their request for Abbigail's guardianship is contrary to her welfare and best interests. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the pertinent authorities, and the record designated for appellate consideration, we affirm the decision of the Cabell County Circuit Court.

Va. I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The underlying facts are largely undisputed by the parties. The minor child at issue in these proceedings, Abbigail Faye B., was born on August 3, 2006, to Autumn S. and Josh B. At the time of the child's birth, Autumn was seventeen years old[2] and resided with her mother, Gala, and her stepfather, Brent. Josh, who was also approximately seventeen years old at that time, resided on the property of Gala and Brent in rooms located above their shop. Abbigail's birth certificate did not list Josh as her father, and the parties disagree as to the reason for this: Gala suggests that Autumn did not want to list Josh as the child's father for fear she would lose custody, while Autumn represents that Gala would not allow her to list Josh's name as the baby's father. In any event, Josh ultimately acknowledged paternity in February 2007.

Approximately three weeks after Abbigail was born, Autumn and Josh attended a family reunion in Paducah, Kentucky, leaving Abbigail in the care of Gala and Brent.[3] Upon returning from that trip, Autumn claimed that Josh had raped her while they were in Kentucky, but she later recanted. Also following their return, Josh moved off of [2]Autumn's birth date is December 2, 1988.

[3]Autumn indicated that she had planned to take Abbigail on this trip with her, but because Abbigail had a severe case of thrush, Gala and Brent had said they would care for Abbigail and encouraged Autumn to continue with her travel plans.

Autumn's parents' property. Autumn subsequently returned to high school and continued to reside with her parents.

From the beginning of Abbigail's young life, Gala and Brent appear to have played a very active role in taking care of their grandchild. Although Autumn resided in their home, it seems that she relied heavily upon her parents to help her with Abbigail's care or to actually provide such care for her. Autumn's grandmother, Alice F. (hereinafter "Alice"), also provided substantial care for Abbigail. While Autumn attended high school,[4] Gala and Alice would care for Abbigail. Gala contends that she did not believe that Autumn was properly looking after Abbigail's health concerns and states that when Autumn and Josh went to Kentucky, she decided to take over. The record indicates that Abbigail had various health issues, including gastroesophageal reflux disease, problems with her right leg which required physical therapy, and auditory and tactile sensory issues that affected her ability to tolerate new textures and impacted her willingness to eat a variety of foods. Gala suggests that even though Abbigail had these various medical conditions, Autumn did not actively participate in her special feeding routine or follow through with Abbigail's therapy at home.[5] Gala also indicates that Josh did not heed Abbigail's feeding requirements and often played with her inappropriately following her feedings by holding her upside down and not holding her upright for thirty minutes after she had eaten. Additionally, Gala reports that Josh had very limited interaction with Abbigail and often just stared at the child without talking to her or touching her.

In the early morning hours of February 20, 2007, Autumn moved out of her parents' home without their knowledge; Autumn left Abbigail in Gala and Brent's care while she established a new residence. On that same date, Autumn filed a domestic violence petition in the Magistrate Court of Cabell County on behalf of Abbigail and against Gala alleging that Gala would not return Abbigail to her. Also on February 20, 2007, Gala filed a pro se petition for appointment of guardian, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 (2006) (Supp. 2007), in the Circuit Court of Cabell County, alleging that "Mother has ranaway [sic] & left the baby Abbigail with the materal [sic] Grandparents. The where abouts [sic] of the mother are unknown." The next day, February 21, 2007, Gala filed a domestic violence petition in the Magistrate Court of Cabell County on behalf of Abbigail and against Autumn. Thereafter, Gala and Brent obtained counsel and, by counsel, filed an amended petition for guardianship on March 1, 2007, which amendments include allegations of the abuse and neglect of Abbigail by Autumn and Josh. Among other things, the amended guardianship petition included allegations that Autumn and Josh were not fit parents because they refuse to acknowledge Abbigail's various medical conditions and neither of them has a valid driver's license; since the child's birth, Autumn has twice "left the home and abandoned the child to the grandparents"; Autumn has accused Josh of being violent towards her and raping her; and Josh allegedly uses illegal drugs and "has a significant criminal history."

All three of these cases, the two domestic violence petitions filed in magistrate court and the petition for guardianship filed in circuit court, were referred to the Family Court of Cabell County and heard together on February 27, 2007.[6] A Guardian ad Litem was appointed for the minor child, and a hearing was held in the family court on March 2, 2007, after which the court entered an order. In its order of March 2, 2007, the family court awarded temporary custody of Abbigail to Gala and Brent and, as a result of the allegations of abuse and neglect contained in the amended petition for guardianship, continued and removed the case to the Circuit Court of Cabell County[7] and further referred the matter to the Child Protective Services Division of the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "CPS"). The family court also dismissed the two domestic violence petitions for lack of sufficient evidence to support the issuance of a domestic violence protective order as to either petition. In addition to these rulings, the parties represent that the family court, during the progress of the underlying hearing, also recognized Josh as a party to these proceedings[8] and granted supervised visitation to Autumn and Josh, although such rulings are not contained in the above-referenced order.

On April 26, 2007, CPS filed its investigation report. It concluded that Abbigail was not an abused or neglected child and that she did not need further CPS services while she remained in her grandparents' care. The CPS worker opined, however, that while Autumn and Josh had not abandoned Abbigail, there was a moderate risk of abuse and/or neglect if she were reunited with her parents. Thus, CPS suggested that if Autumn and Josh regained Abbigail's custody, community services be provided to them.

The circuit court then held hearings on May 7, 2007; May 25, 2007; and June

The court then placed Abbigail with her parents, Autumn and Josh,[10] through the use of a transitional period. Gala and Brent were awarded visitation with Abbigail. From this ruling, Gala and Brent appeal to this Court.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In this case, we are asked to review the circuit court's order denying Gala and Brent's petition for guardianship of Abbigail. We previously have held, in cases seeking the custody of a child, that

> [t]he exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless

[9]During these hearings, evidence was presented to show that Josh had had various arrests for traffic offenses and that he had illegally used alcohol and other drugs, which, in turn, led to at least one arrest for possession. It is unclear whether Josh has a current driver's license or if his license is still suspended. With respect to Autumn, evidence was introduced to show that she does not have a valid driver's license or learner's permit, and, when she moved out of her parents' house in February 2007, she quit high school and has not yet obtained her GED.

[10]The record indicates that Autumn and Josh were married on July 4, 2007.

> that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal.

Syl. pt. 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W. Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989). Moreover, to the extent that the circuit court's decision involved the interpretation and application of the guardianship statute, W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, to the facts of this case, our review is plenary. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995). Accord Syl. pt. 1, Appalachian Power Co. v. State Tax Dep't of West Virginia, 195 W. Va. 573, 466 S.E.2d 424 (1995) ("Interpreting a statute or an administrative rule or regulation presents a purely legal question subject to de novo review."). Guided by these standards, we proceed to consider the errors assigned by the parties.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, Gala and Brent complain that the circuit court erred by refusing their petition for guardianship of Abbigail. In ruling upon said petition, the circuit court concluded that the petitioners had not met their burden of proving that Abbigail was an abused or neglected child or that Autumn was not a fit parent. Assigning error to the circuit court's ruling, Gala and Brent contend that they sustained their burden of proving that Autumn is not a fit parent and that Abbigail's best interests would be served by awarding her guardianship to Gala and Brent. They further argue that the circuit court erred by requiring them to prove that Abbigail was an abused or neglected child. Both Autumn and Josh, as well as Abbigail's Guardian ad Litem, respond that Autumn and Josh are fit parents and that Abbigail's best interests would be promoted by returning her custody to her biological parents, Autumn and Josh. The Guardian ad Litem further contends that the circuit court did not err by requiring Gala and Brent to prove abuse and neglect by clear and convincing evidence insofar as their petition for guardianship contained such allegations and served as the impetus for removing the case from family court to circuit court in accordance with Rule 48a(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court.

A. W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 (2006) (Supp. 2007)

The case sub judice originated with the filing, by Gala and Brent, of a petition for the guardianship of Abbigail pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 (2006) (Supp. 2007).[11] This statute provides:

[11]Although it is apparent from the facts of this case that Gala and Brent actually were seeking to obtain physical custody of Abbigail, it was proper for them to proceed under the provisions of the guardianship statute, W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, as they did in this case. The statutory provisions relating to guardians and wards generally, W. Va. Code § 44-10-1, et seq., have frequently been relied upon by this Court when (continued...)

making custodial determinations. See, e.g., W. Va. Code § 44-10-4 (2004) (Repl. Vol. 2004) (permitting child fourteen years of age or older to nominate his/her guardian); Syl. pt. 7, in part, Garska v. McCoy, 167 W. Va. 59, 278 S.E.2d 357 (1981) (holding that "an adolescent fourteen years of age or older . . . has an absolute right under W. Va. Code, 44-10-4 [1923] to nominate his own guardian"). Moreover, those statutes dealing specifically with child custody, W. Va. Code § 48-9-101, et seq., "set[] forth principles governing the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for a minor child when the parents do not live together." W. Va. Code § 48-9-101(a) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004). In the case sub judice, however, neither the biological parents' living arrangements nor their marital status was a precipitating factor for the filing of the guardianship petition. Rather, Gala and Brent averred that Autumn was not a fit parent and that Abbigail's best interests required that her guardianship be awarded to Gala and Brent. Additionally, since said petition was filed, Autumn and Josh have married each other and are residing together in the same household. Thus, the statutory provisions governing child custody determinations do not apply to the facts of this case. Finally, Autumn and Josh have argued that this case involves issues of grandparent visitation. It is clear from the record in this case and the arguments asserted by Gala and Brent that they did not file a petition for grandparent visitation but instead seek much greater privileges and responsibilities vis-a-vis Abbigail than the limited rights an award of grandparent visitation would grant them. See generally W. Va. Code § 48-10-101, et seq. Therefore, we will decide this case in accordance with the statutory provisions concerning the guardianship of minors. Because our case law has often treated custodial and guardianship terminology interchangeably, we will consider also those authorities addressing child custody when necessary to our consideration of the guardianship matters at issue herein. See, e.g., Garska v. McCoy, 167 W. Va. 59, 278 S.E.2d 357; State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W. Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972); State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d 798 (1969); *Whiteman v. court. The court shall hear the petition for the appointment of a guardian within ten days after the petition is filed.

(c) The court, the guardian or the minor may revoke or terminate the guardianship appointment when:

(1) The minor reaches the age of eighteen and executes a release stating that the guardian estate was properly administered and that the minor has received the assets of the estate from the guardian;

(2) The guardian or the minor dies;

(3) The guardian petitions the court to resign and the court enters an order approving the resignation; or

(4) A petition is filed by the guardian, the minor, an interested person or upon the motion of the court stating that the minor is no longer in need of the assistance or protection of a guardian.

Id.

In order to assess the correctness of the circuit court's order denying Gala and Brent's petition for guardianship, we must first consider the language of the statute under which Gala and Brent filed their petition and upon which the lower tribunal based its ruling. "The primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syl. pt. 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975). After considering the legislative intent, we next must examine the precise words used by the Legislature. "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syl. pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951). See also DeVane v. Kennedy, 205 W. Va. 519, 529, 519 S.E.2d 622, 632 (1999) ("Where the language of a statutory provision is plain, its terms should be applied as written and not construed." (citations omitted)); Syl. pt. 5, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, V.F.W., 144 W. Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959) ("When a statute is clear and unambiguous and the legislative intent is plain, the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute."). But see Syl. pt. 1, Farley v. Buckalew, 186 W. Va. 693, 414 S.E.2d 454 (1992) ("A statute that is ambiguous must be construed before it can be applied."); Syl. pt. 1, Ohio County Comm'n v. Manchin, 171 W. Va. 552, 301 S.E.2d 183 (1983) ("Judicial interpretation of a statute is warranted only if the statute is ambiguous and the initial step in such interpretative inquiry is to ascertain the legislative intent.").

The operative language of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 that is at issue in this case is set forth in subsection (a):

> The circuit court or family court of the county in which the minor resides, or if the minor is a nonresident of the state, the county in which the minor has an estate, may appoint as the minor's guardian a suitable person. The father or mother shall receive priority. However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian.

We have had few prior occasions upon which to consider this statutory language. Most of our prior opinions citing W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 have done so only in passing while discussing guardian-ward relationships in general rather than giving this statute in-depth treatment. See, e.g., Glen Falls Ins. Co. v. Smith, 217 W. Va. 213, 222, 617 S.E.2d 760, 769 (2005); In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 637, 619 S.E.2d 138, 150 (2005); Idleman v. Groves, 89 W. Va. 91, 95-96, 108 S.E. 485, 486-87 (1921). See also Provident Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Little, 88 F. Supp. 2d 604, 608 (S.D. W. Va.), aff'd, 238 F.3d 414 (4th Cir. 2000) (unpublished table decision).

However, in the case of In re Custody of Woolfolk, 170 W. Va. 238, 293 S.E.2d 316 (1982) (per curiam), this Court specifically did address the language of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 in rendering its decision. Woolfolk involved the distinction between a minor child's two guardians: one who was appointed as "guardian of the [minor child's] property," 170 W. Va. at 238, 293 S.E.2d at 316 (internal quotations and citation omitted), and one who, being the child's natural father, was appointed for "the sole purpose of . . . giv[ing] permission for medical treatment for said infant," 170 W. Va. at 239, 293 S.E.2d at 317 (internal quotations and citation omitted). In determining the scope of each guardian's authority over the child, the Court considered W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 and held, in the sole Syllabus point, that

> "[t]he county court of any county in which any minor resides . . . may . . . appoint as guardian for him some suitable person, preferring first the father or the mother; but in every case the competency and fitness of the person, and the welfare and best interest of the minor, shall govern the court in making the selection." W. Va. Code, 44-10-3 (1923).

170 W. Va. 238, 293 S.E.2d 316.

While directly on point with the facts and issues involved in the instant appeal, this syllabus point is somewhat problematic, though, insofar as it was adopted in a per curiam opinion. We previously have held that "[t]his Court will use signed opinions when new points of law are announced and those points will be articulated through syllabus points as required by our state constitution." Syl. pt. 2, Walker v. Doe, 210 W. Va. 490, 558 S.E.2d 290 (2001). Thus, it is apparent that the announcement of a new point of law regarding W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 should have occurred in a signed opinion and not in a per curiam opinion such as was the case in Woolfolk. Comparing the version of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 that was at issue in Woolfolk with the legislative amendments to that section that have been adopted since our decision therein, we find the differences to be only slight and not demonstrative of a substantial change in the fundamental meaning or intent of that statute. We further conclude that the language employed in the current version of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 is plain and does not require further construction. Therefore, consistent with our prior decision in Woolfolk but in keeping with the present statutory language, we hold that, pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) (2006) (Supp. 2007), the circuit court or family court of the county in which a minor resides may appoint a suitable person to serve as the minor's guardian. In appointing a guardian, the court shall give priority to the minor's mother or father. "However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian." W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a).

B. Allegations of Child Abuse and Neglect in Guardianship Petitions

In applying W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) to determine whether Gala and Brent should be appointed as Abbigail's guardians, the circuit court also incorporated the clear and convincing standard of proof applicable to abuse and neglect proceedings. See W. Va. R. Prac. & Proc. for Fam. Ct. 48a(a) ("[A]llegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence."). See also W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (2006) (Supp. 2007) (requiring the findings of abuse and neglect must be "proven by clear and convincing proof"); Syl. pt. 3, In re Randy H., 220 W. Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006) ("'W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden.' Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981)."). Although either the family court or the circuit court of the county in which the minor resides may hear a petition for guardianship, W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a), if the petition is filed in the family court and contains allegations of abuse and neglect, Rule 48a(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court requires the proceeding to be transferred to the circuit court and further requires the circuit court, in turn, to apply the clear and convincing standard of proof that is applicable to abuse and neglect cases generally.

Rule 48a directs:

> (a) Removal by family court to circuit court of infant guardianship cases involving child abuse and neglect. — If a family court learns that the basis, in whole or part, of a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court before whom the guardianship proceeding is pending shall remove the case to the circuit court for hearing. Should the family court learn of such allegations of child abuse and neglect during the hearing, then the family court shall continue the hearing, subject to an appropriate temporary guardianship order, and remove the case to the circuit court for hearing to be conducted within 10 days, for determination of all issues. At the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence. Immediately upon removal, the circuit clerk shall forthwith send the removal notice to the circuit court. Upon receipt of > the removal notice, the circuit court shall forthwith cause notice to be served in accordance with W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 and to the Department of Health and Human Resources who shall be served with notice of the petition, including a copy of the petition, and of the final hearing to be conducted before the circuit court. Such notice to the Department of Health and Human Resources shall constitute a report by the family and circuit courts pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6A-2.

> (b) Investigation of abuse and neglect. — Upon removal of the infant guardianship petition, the circuit court may utilize the investigative and mandamus process and related procedures set forth in Rule 3a of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings if the court deems it necessary or appropriate under the circumstances presented. The circuit court shall allow the petitioner for infant guardianship to appear as a co-petitioner on the petition filed by the Department of Health and Human Services pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq., or a prohibition against the filing of a W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq., petition by the petitioner for infant guardianship should the Department show cause why it will not file such a petition.

At issue herein is the language contained in subsection (a) requiring a family court to remove guardianship cases alleging child abuse and neglect to the circuit court for further proceedings. Reading this rule in conjunction with the language of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, we find the directives to be clear. Accordingly, we hold that Rule 48a(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court requires that if a family court presiding over a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 learns that the basis for the petition, in whole or in part, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court is required to remove the petition to circuit court for a hearing thereon. Furthermore, "[a]t the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence." West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court 48a(a).

The initial guardianship petition filed pro se by Gala and Brent alleged as grounds therefor that "Mother has ranaway [sic] & left the baby Abbigail with the materal [sic] Grandparents. The where abouts [sic] of the mother are unknown." After obtaining counsel, Gala and Brent filed an amended petition for guardianship alleging, in part, that since the child's birth, "the biological mother, Autumn S[.], has lived in the home [of Gala and Brent] but on two occasions since the child's birth, she has left the home and abandoned the child to the grandparents." Both of these petitions were filed in the Circuit Court of Cabell County, assigned to the Family Court of Cabell County, and, following a hearing thereon, removed to the circuit court based upon the allegations of abuse and neglect contained therein. Despite these allegations in the lower tribunals, on appeal to this Court, Gala and Brent vehemently argue that Abbigail was not an abused and neglected child while she was in their care, and that, consequently, the circuit court erred by applying the clear and convincing burden of proof. Their argument fails to appreciate, however, that the issue is not whether Abbigail was abused and neglected while she was in their care, but rather whether she was abused and neglected while she was in Autumn's care. It goes without saying that persons accused of abusing and neglecting a child would have no business petitioning a court to be that child's guardian. Rather, the operative inquiry is whether the person from whom the petitioners are attempting to wrest the child's guardianship has committed such malfeasance; here, because Gala and Brent are seeking to obtain guardianship by divesting Autumn of the same, the question is whether Abbigail suffered abuse and neglect while in Autumn's care. Therefore, we must determine whether the allegations contained in Gala and Brent's amended petition for guardianship rose to the level of allegations of abuse and neglect such that the circuit court was required to review the evidence under the clear and convincing standard.

The phrase used in Rule 48a(a), "child abuse and neglect," is defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(d) (2006) (Supp. 2006)[12] as "physical injury, mental or emotional injury, sexual abuse, sexual exploitation, sale or attempted sale or negligent treatment or maltreatment of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian who is responsible for the child's welfare, under circumstances which harm or threaten the health and welfare of the child." Here, Gala and Brent alleged in both their initial and amended petitions for guardianship that Autumn had abandoned her child. Either of these allegations, apart from several of the other allegations contained in the petitions, is suggestive of "negligent treatment . . . of a child by a parent . . . who is responsible for the child's welfare, under circumstances which harm or threaten the health and welfare of the child," W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(d), because an infant who was either three weeks old, at the time Autumn went to Paducah, Kentucky, or who was six months old, at the time Autumn left her parents' home, was incapable of caring for him/herself.[13] In light of these allegations, the family court correctly removed the petition to the circuit court for further proceedings. Furthermore, because the guardianship petition alleged that the subject child had been abused and neglected, the circuit court was obligated to consider the evidence presented in accordance with the standard of proof for abuse and neglect cases generally, i.e., clear and convincing evidence, and it correctly did so. See W. Va. R. Prac. & Proc. for Fam. Ct. 48a(a). Consequently, we do not find that the circuit court erred in this regard.

[12]Since the time of the events at issue in the case sub judice, W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 has been amended. However, those amendments do not affect the statutory language considered in this opinion. Compare W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 (2006) (Supp. 2006) with W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 (2007) (Supp. 2007).

C. Parental Priority if Competent and Fit

Turning now to the circuit court's rulings denying Gala and Brent's petition for guardianship, W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) permits a court to appoint a guardian for a minor child if the proposed guardian is competent and fit, but requires the court to accord priority to the child's mother or father. See W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) ("The father or mother shall receive priority."). Under the facts of the case sub judice, the circuit court determined that "the Petitioners [Gala and Brent] have failed to meet their burden in this matter to show . . . that Autumn S[.], the natural mother of Abbigail, is not capable of being a fit parent." Before this Court, Gala and Brent argue that they offered sufficient proof of Autumn's unfitness, including her lack of bonding with Abbigail and her unwillingness to help with child care duties, such that they should have been awarded Abbigail's guardianship. We disagree.

[13]As will be discussed in greater detail in Section III.C., infra, although these allegations raise a red flag that abuse and neglect has been alleged such to require removal of the guardianship petition from family court to circuit court, we do not find that Autumn abused and neglected Abbigail.

Divesting a child's biological parent of his/her guardianship, or custody,[14] is a very serious matter. This Court repeatedly has recognized the inherent rights parents have to the custody of their own children, and any party seeking to interfere with such rights must bear a heavy burden. In our earliest cases on the subject, we adopted the then-prevailing views evidencing a presumption in favor of the child's father. For example, in Syllabus point 3 of Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 698, 14 S.E. 212 (1891), we held that "[t]he father is the natural guardian of his infant children, and, in the absence of good and sufficient cause shown, is entitled to their custody." Accord Syl. pt. 2, Hurley v. Hurley, 71 W. Va. 269, 76 S.E. 438 (1912) ("The father is legally entitled to the custody of his infant child, if fit for the trust, and the same should not be denied him unless the child's welfare or other considerations clearly outweigh his legal right."); Syl. pt. 3, in part, Mathews v. Wade, 2 W. Va. 464 (1868) ("By the Code of Virginia, 1860, a lawfully appointed guardian has the custody of his ward . . . but the father of the minor, if living, and in case of his death, the mother, while she remains unmarried, shall, if fit for the trust, be entitled to the custody of the person of the minor[.]"). As our law evolved, we gradually appreciated the corresponding rights of a child's mother to the custody of her child: "With reference to the custody of very young children, the law favors the mother if she is a fit person, other things being equal . . . ." Syl. pt. 2, in part, Settle v. Settle, 117 W. Va. 476, 185 S.E.2d 859 (1936), superseded by statute as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 61, 385 S.E.2d 912, 916 (1989) (recognizing that 1980 amendments to W. Va. Code § 48-2-15 (1980) (Repl. Vol. 1980) and prior decision in Garska v. McCoy, 167 W. Va. 59, 70, 278 S.E.2d 357, 363 (1981), "abolished the gender-based presumption" of "maternal preference" in child custody matters).

Through the continued development of the law in this area, though, we gradually recognized parental rights as more generally applicable to either parent. One of our first such cases defining the scope of such parental rights is Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960), in which we held, in the single Syllabus point:

> A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.

Accord Syl., State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d 798 (1969). We also have appreciated that such rights are not just constructs of the courts, but that they are basic liberties secured by the state and federal constitutions:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

The facts of this case, like many of our domestic law cases, suggest a familial situation in which a child is fortunate to have many people who love her and who want to take care of her. While a child may have many different types of caretakers, only a select few may be awarded his/her guardianship. We appreciate the concerns of Gala and Brent regarding their perceptions of Autumn's and Josh's abilities to parent their child. Nevertheless, the relief they seek is not a remedy that we bestow lightly. Although there are circumstances in which parents should not serve as the guardians for their child(ren), the vast majority of those cases are handled through the child abuse and neglect process to ensure that parents' rights are not unnecessarily trammeled.

In the case sub judice, the circuit court heard testimony presented both by Gala and Brent and by Autumn and Josh, and was charged with assessing the credibility of the various witnesses. Having reviewed the transcripts of those hearings, we agree with the circuit court's assessment of the evidence and its ultimate conclusion that Autumn is capable of being a fit parent. The standard by which we typically determine parental fitness is that set forth in Whiteman v. Robinson, which directs a court to consider the following factors: "misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody." Syl., 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691. Applying these factors to the facts before us, there do not appear to be any allegations that Autumn is guilty of misconduct or immorality, that she has waived her parental rights, or that she has transferred, relinquished, or surrendered custody of Abbigail.

With respect to Gala and Brent's allegations that Autumn had twice abandoned her child, we do not find that those two instances are sufficient to divest Autumn of Abbigail's guardianship. On the first alleged occasion of abandonment, it appears that Autumn and Josh had planned a trip to a family reunion and that they had planned to take Abbigail with them. However, at the time of their departure, Abbigail was sick, and it appears that Autumn was encouraged to proceed with her travel plans while Gala and Brent cared for Abbigail.[15] It goes without saying that leaving a child in another's care after having made such care arrangements does not constitute abandonment. The second alleged instance of abandonment apparently followed a heated discussion between Autumn and Gala and Brent. It seems that Autumn moved out of her parents' residence and left Abbigail in their care until she could establish a new residence for herself and her daughter. Although she left earlier in the day than was customary, Autumn was, at this point, still attending high school and left Abbigail at the home of Gala and Brent and in their care on a daily basis. Moreover, Gala and Brent filed their petition for guardianship the same day that Autumn moved out. By filing their guardianship petition, the animosities between the parties undoubtedly had escalated such that Autumn likely would not have been permitted to remove Abbigail from Gala and Brent's home. We do not find this isolated incident, under the particular facts of this case, to be sufficient upon which to base a change of a Abbigail's guardianship.

Lastly, we do not find that Autumn either neglected Abbigail or that she was otherwise derelict in any other of her parental duties. Autumn was a new mother, and a relatively young new mother at that. She lived in her parents' home, and her grandmother lived next door. Autumn received substantial help from both her mother and her grandmother in caring for her child, and both Autumn's mother and grandmother provided a significant amount of care for Abbigail to allow Autumn to continue attending high school. However, when questioned during the hearings in this matter, both Autumn and Gala were critical of the other's participation in Abbigail's care: Autumn indicated that she was made to feel inadequate when attending to Abbigail's needs while Gala suggested that Autumn lacked initiative in caring for Abbigail. Absent further evidence to indicate that Autumn is not a fit and competent person to serve as Abbigail's guardian, we find the circuit court correctly accorded priority to Autumn, as Abbigail's mother, in determining the minor's guardianship and affirm the circuit court's ruling in this regard.

As a final matter, we note that although Josh has participated in these proceedings, the initial guardianship petition was filed against Autumn only. Thus, it appears that the circuit court, in its final order, limited its ruling on parental fitness to apply only to Autumn even though the amended guardianship petition also challenged Josh's fitness as a parent. While the circuit court did not specifically state in its order that it also found Josh to be a fit and competent person to serve as Abbigail's guardian, neither did it find that Josh was unfit or incompetent to be the child's guardian. Nevertheless, Josh's fitness may be inferred from the court's inclusion of Josh in its plan of reunification insofar as it placed Abbigail with both of her parents. Upon a review of the record evidence, we reiterate our conclusion that not only was Autumn a relatively young new mother, but also Josh was a relatively young new father. We do not disagree that Josh's background is not perfect. Allegations of Josh's traffic citations, underage drinking, and use of marijuana are contained in the record. It also is apparent that there is much animosity between Gala and Brent and Josh, and that this acrimony may have prevented Josh from visiting and interacting with Abbigail while she resided in Gala and Brent's home. Be that as it may, Josh's participation in these guardianship proceedings since their commencement indicates a strong commitment on his part to participate in his child's life, and he has taken steps towards that end by marrying his child's mother and establishing a home for his family. While we are not unmindful of Josh's past transgressions, unless and until we are presented with more solid evidence indicating that he is not fit or competent to serve as Abbigail's guardian, we will accord him, as the child's father, the statutory preference mandated by W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a).

D. Welfare and Best Interests of Minor

According a preference to Abbigail's parents, Autumn and Josh, is not conclusive of our determination of Abbigail's guardianship unless such a placement also serves her "welfare and best interests," W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a). The circuit court neglected to reference Abbigail's welfare and best interests in its final order, but, during its June 8, 2007, hearing, the court acknowledged that the best interests of the child "must be the controlling factor" in rendering a decision in this case. Therefore, we will presume that the circuit court found that a denial of Gala and Brent's guardianship petition and that placement of Abbigail in Autumn's and Josh's care satisfied the child's welfare and best interests.

As we previously have indicated, even though parents have substantial rights in guardianship matters, so do the children involved. In fact, we specifically have held that, "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . in all family law matters . . . must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt.

3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). Moreover, we typically have been reluctant to change a child's custodial placement unless such a change will materially promote the child's best interests. In one of this Court's earliest cases, we specifically recognized that the child's welfare is the dispositive factor in child custody matters: "But the court is in no case bound to deliver the child into the custody of any claimant, but may leave it in such custody as the welfare of the child at the time appears to require." Syl. pt. 4, Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 698, 14 S.E. 212 (1891). Accord Syl. pt. 1, Frame v. Wehn, 120 W. Va. 208, 197 S.E. 524 (1938) ("'"In contest over the custody of an infant, the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided." State ex rel. Palmer v. Postlethwaite, 106 W. Va. 383, 145 S.E. 738 [(1928)].' State ex rel. Cooke v. Williams, 107 W. Va. 450, 148 S.E. 488 [(1929)]; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 109 W. Va. 513, 155 S.E. 652 [(1930)]."). See also Syl. pt. 2, Cloud v. Cloud, 161 W. Va. 45, 239 S.E.2d 669 (1977) (per curiam) ("To justify a change of child custody, in addition to a change in circumstances of the parties, it must be shown that such change would materially promote the welfare of the child.").

Gala and Brent have argued at length that Abbigail's best interests would best be served by awarding them her guardianship. In support of their claims, Gala and Brent reference how much Abbigail has bonded with them, how involved they have been in her therapy, and how a drastic change of her environment could wreak havoc on her delicate state in light of her numerous medical conditions.[16] We do not doubt that Gala and Brent could provide a fine home for Abbigail as they have already done so for Autumn and her siblings. Nevertheless, "[w]hile courts always look to the best interests of the child in controversies concerning his or her custody, such custody should not be denied to a parent merely because some other person might possibly furnish the child a better home or better care." Syl. pt. 3, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).

Here, we agree with the circuit court's assessment that Abbigail's best interests require her to be placed with her parents, Autumn and Josh. Although Abbigail has bonded significantly with Gala and Brent, she should also be afforded the opportunity to bond with her biological parents, Autumn and Josh. Simply because Gala and Brent have been in a position to provide substantial care for Abbigail, at times to the exclusion of Autumn and Josh, does not presumptively make them a better placement for Abbigail. The record before us suggests that Autumn and Josh also are capable of providing a suitable home for Abbigail. In fact, in response to the concerns raised in this case, the Child Protective Services Division of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources conducted a preliminary investigation of Autumn and Josh, and their home, and did not find any conditions necessitating further proceedings. Absent evidence that [16]See Section I, supra.

Abbigail's safety would be endangered by awarding her guardianship to her parents, we cannot find any justification in the record to indicate that her welfare and best interests would not be served by placing her with her parents, Autumn and Josh, particularly in light of our prior findings that they are fit and competent to serve as her guardians and have, thus, been accorded a statutory preference pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a). Accordingly, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion and affirm the lower court's ruling on this point.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the July 9, 2007, order of the Circuit Court of Cabell County is hereby affirmed.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

ALIREZA D., Plaintiff Below, Appellee

v.

KIM ELAINE W., Defendant Below, Appellant

No. 23420

Submitted: September 24, 1996

Filed: November 18, 1996

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Questions relating to alimony and to the maintenance and custody of the children are within the sound discretion of the court and its action with respect to such matters will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused." Syllabus, Nichols v. Nichols, 160 W. Va. 514, 236 S.E.2d 36 (1977).

2. "To justify a change of child custody, in addition to a change in circumstances of the parties, it must be shown that such change would materially promote the welfare of the child." Syl. pt. 2, Cloud v. Cloud, 161 W. Va. 45, 239 S.E.2d 669 (1977).

3. "Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) (1991), the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court." Syl. pt. 3, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

Per Curiam:

This action is before this Court See footnote 1 upon an appeal from the final order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, entered on January 24, 1995. The final order modified the parties' 1990 divorce decree which awarded custody of the parties' two children to the appellant, Kim Elaine W. Pursuant to the final order, custody of the older child was awarded to the appellee, Alireza D. See footnote 2 The appellant contends that the modification was error.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and the briefs and argument of counsel. For the reasons stated below, the final order is reversed, and the circuit court is directed to restore custody of the older child to the appellant. Moreover, as detailed below, this action is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings.

I

The record in this action consists of hundreds of pages of orders, pleadings, transcripts and exhibits, and the briefs before this Court are lengthy. Unfortunately, those documents describe a bitter and long-standing dispute in the aftermath of the 1990 divorce concerning the parties' children.

The appellant and the appellee were married in 1975 and last cohabited in Charleston, Kanawha County, West Virginia. The parties had two children during the marriage: Ali, born on October 15, 1979, and Bijan, born on July 20, 1983. The parties separated in 1989, and the appellee filed a complaint for divorce in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County. On January 8, 1990, that court entered a divorce decree which incorporated the parties' separation agreement.

Pursuant to the terms of the divorce decree, the appellant was awarded custody of the two children, and the appellee was ordered to pay a total of $675 per month for child support. The level of child support was computed in accord with this State's Guidelines for Child Support Awards, the current authority for which is found in W. Va. Code, 48A-1B-1 [1996], et seq. In addition, the appellee was ordered to provide full medical, hospitalization and other health insurance for the children. Moreover, the divorce decree provided that the parties would not "adversely influence the minor children against the other parent."

Following the divorce, the appellee sought employment at various locations beyond the State of West Virginia in the course of his career as a computer programmer. The appellant, on the other hand, remained in the Kanawha County area and remarried in August 1990.

In February 1992, the appellee filed the first of several petitions in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County seeking custody of the parties' two children. Thereafter, the action was referred to a family law master who conducted a series of evidentiary hearings upon the issue of custody and upon other issues raised by the parties.

The evidence adduced at the family law master level was voluminous. The evidence indicated that, to some extent, both the appellant and the appellee had violated the admonition expressed in the divorce decree that the parties would not adversely influence the minor children against the other parent. Nevertheless, the evidence concerning the conduct of the appellee was clearly more damaging. That evidence demonstrated that, following the entry of the divorce decree, the appellee engaged upon a course of conduct, over a considerable period of time, designed to alienate the children from their mother, the appellant. The appellee's conduct included instructing the children to be disruptive while in the appellant's care and coaching them to continuously proclaim to others a desire to live with the appellee. See footnote 3 The appellee's actions were particularly directed toward the older son, Ali, who is presently seventeen years old.

In analyzing the evidence, the family law master ultimately focused upon the conclusions of two Charleston area psychiatrists who considered the custody issue. The psychiatrists were Dr. Russell I. Voltin and Dr. John P. MacCallum. As set forth in his 1992 deposition, Dr. Voltin interviewed Bijan and the appellant and concluded that the appellee had been guilty of "emotional abuse" toward the children in terms of the conduct described above. Consequently, Dr. Voltin recommended that the appellant retain custody of both sons. On the other hand, Dr. MacCallum, who interviewed both parties, the two children and the appellant's current husband, concluded that, although the appellee had, in fact, sought to alienate the children from their mother, the appellee was not an unfit parent. Moreover, Dr. MacCallum was reluctant to conclude that the appellee's conduct constituted "emotional abuse." Noting that the older child, Ali, had expressed a desire to live with his father, the appellee, Dr. MacCallum was in agreement with Dr. Voltin that Ali's statement in that regard was, no doubt, simply reflective of the appellee's wishes. Nevertheless, affording some weight to Ali's desire to live with his father and considering all relevant circumstances, including Ali's age, Dr. MacCallum recommended that the appellee be awarded custody of Ali and that the appellant retain custody of Bijan.

After further proceedings, the family law master filed a recommended decision with the circuit court. As stated in that decision, the family law master found, inter alia, that the older child, Ali, has been residing with the appellee since August 1993 and that Ali had stated to the family law master that he wanted to live with his father. Moreover, noting that Dr. Voltin never interviewed Ali, the recommended decision restated the findings of Dr. MacCallum and concluded, as did Dr. MacCallum, that Ali should remain with the appellee. In particular, the recommended decision stated that the remarriage of the appellant, the relocation of the appellee, the fact that Ali has resided with the appellee since August 1993 and the expressed desire of Ali to live with his father, "all constitute a material change in the circumstances" of the parties relative to the issue of custody, and that a change in custody, as to Ali, would be in that child's best interests.

Following various hearings conducted in the circuit court in September 1994, the circuit court, pursuant to the final order entered on January 24, 1995, adopted the recommended decision of the family law master and awarded custody of the older child, Ali, to the appellee. This appeal followed.

II

This Court has often observed that a recommended decision of a family law master is reviewable by a circuit court pursuant to statute, W. Va. Code, 48A-4-16 [1993], W. Va. Code, 48A-4-20 [1996], and pursuant to this Court's Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law. As we recently stated in syllabus point 1 of Stephen L. H. v. Sherry L. H., 195 W. Va. 384, 465 S.E.2d 841 (1995): "A circuit court should review findings of fact made by a family law master only under a clearly erroneous standard, and it should review the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard." See also Banker v. Banker, ___ W. Va. ___, 474 S.E.2d 465 (1996). With regard to findings of fact, this Court noted in syllabus point 3 of Stephen L. H.: "Under the clearly erroneous standard, if the findings of fact and the inferences drawn by a family law master are supported by substantial evidence, such findings and inferences may not be overturned even if a circuit court may be inclined to make different findings or draw contrary inferences." See also syl. pt. 1, Higginbotham v. Higginbotham, 189 W. Va. 519, 432 S.E.2d 789 (1993). Of course, the final order of a circuit court in such cases is reviewable by this Court. Magaha v. Magaha, 196 W. Va. 187, ___, 469 S.E.2d 123, 126 (1996); Hinerman v. Hinerman, 194 W. Va. 256, 259, 460 S.E.2d 71, 74 (1995); Marilyn H. v. Roger Lee H., 193 W. Va. 201, 204, 455 S.E.2d 570, 573 (1995). See generally syl. pt. 4, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W. Va. 178, 469 S.E.2d 114 (1996); Phillips v. Fox, 193 W. Va. 657, 661, 458 S.E.2d 327, 331 (1995); syl. pt. 1, Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W. Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995).

Here, the appellant contends that the circuit court committed error in awarding custody of Ali to the appellee. As this Court held in the syllabus point of Nichols v. Nichols, 160 W. Va. 514, 236 S.E.2d 36 (1977): "Questions relating to alimony and to the maintenance and custody of the children are within the sound discretion of the court and its action with respect to such matters will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused." See also Carter v. Carter, ___ W. Va. ___, ___, 470 S.E.2d 193, 198 (1996); syl. pt. 2, Michael v. Michael, 196 W. Va. 155, 469 S.E.2d 14 (1996); syl. pt. 1, Marilyn H., supra. It is in the context of circuit court discretion in such cases that we also observe this Court's holding in syllabus point 2 of Cloud v. Cloud, 161 W. Va. 45, 239 S.E.2d 669 (1977). That syllabus point states: "To justify a change of child custody, in addition to a change in circumstances of the parties, it must be shown that such change would materially promote the welfare of the child." See also W. Va. Code, 48-2-15 [1996]; syl. pt. 1, Donohew v. Donohew, 193 W. Va. 184,

As indicated in the recommended decision, one of the factors considered by the family law master in modifying custody was the expressed desire of the older child, Ali, to live with his father. Although both Dr. Voltin and Dr. MacCallum discounted Ali's choice as being influenced by the appellee, Dr. MacCallum and the family law master afforded the choice some degree of weight. In particular, the family law master relied upon W. Va. Code, 44-10-4 [1931], which states: "If the minor is above the age of fourteen years, he may in the presence of the county court, or in writing acknowledged before any officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of a deed, nominate his own guardian, who, if approved by the court, shall be appointed accordingly [.]" That statute has been cited often by this Court with regard to custody issues in domestic relations actions. As indicated above, Ali is presently seventeen years old and has been residing with the appellee since August 1993. Accordingly, Dr. MacCallum and the family law master correctly suggested that Ali's desire to live with his father must be considered. Nevertheless, the evidence in this action also reveals that the appellee has made an unrelenting effort, dating at least from the entry of the divorce decree in 1990, to alienate the children, and particularly Ali, from their mother. As Dr. MacCallum acknowledged concerning Ali's choice: "[T]he more significant question is does he have the capacity to separate out his own values from those of his father and objectively evaluate the differences? And the answer to that question is, no, he does not and he may not have that for a long time."

This Court has indicated that the right of a child above the age of fourteen to nominate his or her guardian, under W. Va. Code, 44-10-4 [1931], is not without limitations. In Judith R., supra, the absence of evidence of "unfitness" of the parent selected was a relevant consideration. Similarly, in Busch, supra, where a father appealed a denial of his petition for custody of his fourteen-year-old son, this Court noted that, not only had the son expressed a desire to live with his father, no allegation had been made that the father was an unfit parent. Accordingly, this Court reversed and remanded the action to the circuit court with directions to enter an order awarding custody to the father. In so holding, this Court observed, in Busch, that the mother did not oppose the change of custody. In the circumstances of this action, Ali's choice must be viewed in the totality of the appellee's efforts to influence his older son.

The record in this action demonstrates that, following the 1990 divorce, neither the conduct of the appellant nor the conduct of the appellee was exemplary with regard to the children. Each tended to litigate every conceivable aspect of the childrens' status ad infinitum. Nevertheless, although the family law master found neither party to be an unfit parent, the record clearly shows the actions of the appellee to be particularly egregious. As stated above, the appellee's conduct included instructing the children to be disruptive while in the appellant's care and coaching them to continuously proclaim to others a desire to live with him. That conduct occurred over a considerable period of time. As a result, the children have been harmed. See footnote 4 In his report of August 9, 1993, Dr. MacCallum stated:

> [The appellee] appears to have consciously manipulated the family circumstances on numerous occasions to discredit his wife, or to demonstrate the children would be better off in his custody. His methods involve subtle but persistent suggestions to the children about their mother, or about behavior they should pursue. . . . [The appellee] has undermined [Ali's] relationship with his mother to the extent that it may never actually be fully healed or repairable. . . . It has been my observation under such circumstances that those parents who are least defensive, most neutral in their statements about others, and most objective in their statements about themselves, are usually most given to the truth and willing to accept the responsibility for their actions and thoughts. With regard to this extended group of people, [the appellant] and [the step-father] fall into this category but [the appellee] does not.

As stated above, Dr. Voltin recommended that the appellant retain custody of both sons, whereas Dr. MacCallum recommended that custody of Ali be awarded to the appellee. However, when asked whether the modification of custody was in Ali's best interests, Dr. MacCallum admitted: "I can't make what is really a choice in the best interests of this older child because of the circumstances that have already been created [.]" Dr. Voltin and Dr. MacCallum were, in fact, in agreement upon several matters: (1) that the appellee had engaged in a course of conduct designed to alienate the children from their mother, (2) that, consequently, the children had been traumatized psychologically and (3) that the children would benefit from therapy. Moreover, Dr. MacCallum recommended that, assuming custody of Ali would be awarded to the appellee, a plan of supervised visitation be developed with regard to Bijan, in order to preclude further psychological harm to that child. See footnote 5

The family law master is accurate in stating that the remarriage of the appellant, the relocation of the appellee, the fact that Ali has been residing with the appellee and has expressed a desire to continue to do so constitute changes in circumstances relative to Ali's status. However, syllabus point 2 of the Cloud case, supra, requires more than a change of circumstances. Rather, the clear directive of Cloud and its progeny requires the additional showing that a change of custody will materially promote the welfare of the child. This Court is of the opinion that such a showing has not been made in this action and that, specifically, the circuit court abused its discretion in modifying the divorce decree in awarding custody of Ali to the appellee.

Certainly, this Court is not unmindful of Ali's age and the length of time he has resided with the appellee. However, neither of the two experts in this action, Dr. Voltin and Dr. MacCallum, could state unequivocally that the modification of custody would materially promote that child's welfare. Instead, the evidence, on balance, tended to indicate that the modification could result in further harm. See footnote 6

Upon further consideration, this Court is of the opinion that both therapy for the children conducted by a child psychiatrist or child psychologist and supervised visitation are warranted in this action. In fact, as we observed in Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992), therapy and supervised visitation are, at times, mutually dependent, in that proper therapy or counseling can reduce the need for supervised visitation. 190 W. Va. at 347, 438 S.E.2d at 527. Here, the issue of therapy was not addressed by the family law master or the circuit court even though Dr. Voltin and Dr. MacCallum indicated that it would be beneficial in helping the children cope with the appellee's conduct. As this Court recently stated in Mary Ann P. v. William R. P., ___ W. Va. ___, ___, 475 S.E.2d 1, ___ (1996):

> When family problems involving children are of sufficient depth and duration that professional counseling is needed to heal the relationships of the child or children with the parent or parents, or to assist the child or children in dealing with such emotional estrangement, a circuit court may direct participation in such counseling and may in its discretion determine how the cost of such counseling shall be paid.

See also White v. Williamson, 192 W. Va. 683, 694, 453 S.E.2d 666, 677 (1994).

Accordingly, upon remand, the circuit court shall consider and formulate an appropriate program concerning both children for counseling to be conducted by a child psychiatrist or a child psychologist. The cost of the program shall be paid by the appellee, and the parties and the stepfather shall also participate in the program if practicable. Similarly, upon remand, the circuit court shall consider and formulate an appropriate plan for supervised visitation concerning the children. In Mary D., supra, this Court indicated that supervised visitation is authorized in this State under W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1), which provides, generally, for visitation in divorce actions. Syllabus point 3 of Mary D. holds:

> Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) (1991), the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

See also Weber v. Weber, 193 W. Va. 551, 554 n. 6, 457 S.E.2d 488, 491 n. 6 (1995).

Of course, in addition to therapy and supervised visitation, the circuit court will need to address the issue of child support concerning the children. In particular, evidence of year to year fluctuations in the appellee's income as a computer programmer following the 1990 divorce are relevant, under the circumstances of this action, in establishing the level of child support to be ordered. Syl. pt. 1, Ball v. Wills, 190 W. Va. 517, 438 S.E.2d 860 (1993).

Finally, the appellant contends that the circuit court committed error in failing to find that the appellant is entitled to reasonable attorney fees. Specifically, the appellant asserts that, subsequent to the entry of the divorce decree on January 8, 1990, she incurred in excess of $20,000 in attorney fees, primarily because of the misconduct of the appellee concerning custody of the children. Furthermore, the appellant indicates that, at all times relevant to this action, her income was substantially below that of the appellee. The appellee, however, contends that the denial of attorney fees was within the circuit court's discretion and that, in any event, the amount sought by the appellant was not itemized with sufficient particularity.

Generally, the relative degree of fault of a party in divorce related matters has been held by this Court to be a consideration in the award of attorney fees. Syl. pt. 5, Rogers v. Rogers, No. 23075, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, (July 11, 1996); syl. pt. 4, Banker, supra; Hillberry v. Hillberry, 195 W. Va. 600, 606-07, 466 S.E.2d 451, 457-58 (1995). In this action, the record contains ample evidence, as outlined above, supportive of the appellant's assertions concerning the appellee's attempts to alienate the children from their mother. In addition to the psychological harm imposed upon the children as a result, that conduct was in violation of the admonition expressed in the divorce decree that the parties would not adversely influence the minor children against the other parent. The appellant's lack of financial resources, compared to the resources of the appellee, is also shown in the record. Accordingly, the appellant is entitled to an award of reasonable attorney fees, and, upon remand, a determination shall be made as to the specific amount to which the appellant is entitled. See Kinney v. Kinney, 172 W. Va. 284, 304 S.E.2d 870 (1983).

Upon all of the above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, entered on January 24, 1995, is reversed, and this action is remanded to that court for the entry of an order restoring custody of the older child of the parties to the appellant. In addition, upon remand, the circuit court shall enter an appropriate order or orders concerning counseling for both children, supervised visitation, child support and an award of attorney fees to the appellant, all in accord with the principles of this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 The Honorable Arthur M. Recht resigned as Justice of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals effective October 15, 1996. The Honorable Gaston Caperton, Governor of the State of West Virginia, appointed him Judge of the First Judicial Circuit on that same date. Pursuant to an administrative order entered by this Court on October 15, 1996, Judge Recht was assigned to sit as a member of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals commencing October 15, 1996 and continuing until further order of this Court.

Footnote: 3 In one instance, Patrolman Jeff Williamson of the South Charleston Police Department was present at the appellant's residence when the children were being returned following visitation with the appellee. On that occasion, the children expressed a reluctance to return to their mother. However, as Patrolman Williamson testified before the family law master:

Each time the children would say that they didn't want to go back to the mother's residence, they would glance up to the father and glance at the police officer and glance to me and then back to the father as if to be . . . looking for his approval[.]

Moreover, Sergeant Kay West of the child abuse unit of the South Charleston Police Department testified before the family law master as follows, in reference to another occasion:

The older boy, Ali, had stated to me that whenever they would go to their father's to stay with their father, that his Dad was encouraging them to misbehave and be disruptive at home and to cause problems at home and it was like he was encouraging them or coaching them to do that.

Footnote: 4 In a letter dated September 15, 1992, to counsel for the appellant, Dr. Voltin stated:

I had the opportunity to evaluate Bijan on July 2, 1992. During this evaluation I questioned Bijan on behaviors that had been causing problems at home, specifically, running away from home, cursing at his mother, refusing to obey his mother or step- father. Bijan told me that while he was in Lexington with his father and Ali, he was told to call his mother and tell her that he and his brother did not wish to come home. He also told me that his father told him to run away from home . . . . With regard to Bijan's oppositional behavior noted by his mother and step- father and by the description of the interactions that have been occurring between Bijan and his father, it is my medical opinion that within a reasonable degree of psychiatric certainty, Bijan is being subjected to emotional abuse by his father. It is also my opinion, that should this abuse continue it may cause irreparable damage. I have not had the opportunity to evaluate Bijan's brother Ali [;] however, by Bijan's descriptions, it appears that Ali too is suffering from emotional abuse.

Footnote: 5 During his deposition, Dr. MacCallum stated as follows:

I feel certain that the same thing would happen to the younger child that has happened to the older if [the appellee] is allowed unsupervised visitation.

. . . .

So, realistically speaking, I can't recommend to the Court that [Bijan] be supervised in his visitations with his father until he is eighteen. But I would certainly strongly recommend to the Court that supervision continue so long as there is a potential influence and I would leave the decision about when that occurs up to the people who are supervising the visitation.

Footnote: 6 It should be noted that on August 16, 1996, the appellant filed a motion to supplement the record herein with various educational and juvenile records concerning alleged acts of misconduct committed by Ali while residing with the appellee. This Court denied the motion to supplement but granted leave to proceed upon a similar motion in circuit court.

Miller, Justice:

In this appeal, we are asked to determine if the natural mother of a young child can sign a consent to adopt after a petition for abuse and neglect has been filed against her and the circuit court has ordered temporary custody of the child placed in the Department of Health and Human Resources (Department).See footnote 1

The salient facts are as follows. On February 11, 1992, the Department filed a petition against Jacqueline F. and Rick F. It asked that their three-month-old child named Phillip F. be removed immediately from their home. This petition was based on allegations of abuse and neglect and the fact that the child was in imminent danger of physical harm. The circuit court on the same date ordered the child's removal and gave temporary custody to the Department.

An adjudicatory hearing was held on March 13, 1992, with an additional hearing being held on March 30, 1992. The circuit court, at this latter hearing, entered an order finding the child to be neglected and abused. It ordered that temporary custody remain with the Department and that the mother be given a psychiatric evaluation. The mother also was given a six-month noncustodial improvement period. A further hearing was set for May 4, 1992.

At that hearing, the Department filed a family case plan. The Department had placed temporary custody of the child with James and Alphia Ihle, who were approved foster parents. Mark E. and Sherry B. Gorman appeared by counsel at that hearing and asked leave to intervene. In March of 1991, Mr. and Mrs. Gorman adopted another child of Jacqueline F. They now sought to adopt Phillip. The circuit court allowed Mr. and Mrs. Gorman the right to attend future hearings, but advised that they were not to be considered as parties.

Two further status hearings were held with regard to the mother's improvement period. At the first hearing on October 5, 1992, the Department showed that the mother had not made any significant progress. However, the mother did express the desire to make a more diligent effort, and the circuit court extended the improvement period for three months. The second status hearing was held on February 1, 1993. At that time, Mr. and Mrs. Ihle appeared by counsel and requested the right to intervene as they desired permanent guardianship of Phillip.

At a hearing on June 7, 1993, the Department presented evidence that the mother's improvement period was unsuccessful. Its recommendation was that Phillip's reunification with his natural parents would not be successful. The Department also recommended that permanent custody be placed with the Department in order that it might arrange for Phillip's adoption. The mother offered evidence to dispute the Department's contention that her improvement period was not satisfactorily completed. She also testified that if she could not regain custody of Phillip, she desired that Mr. and Mrs. Gorman be given custody.

The matter was continued to June 24, 1993, as Mr. and Mrs. Gorman's counsel indicated he wished to offer evidence that the mother had satisfactorily completed her improvement period. At this hearing, Mr. and Mrs. Gorman's attorney produced a written consent to adopt executed by the mother permitting Mr. and Mrs. Gorman to adopt Phillip. The circuit court decided that the mother's consent to adopt extinguished her parental rights. It held that this action mooted the question of whether she had satisfactorily completed her improvement period. The circuit court did not rule on Mr. and Mrs. Gorman's motion that Phillip be placed with them as foster parents pending his adoption.

At a subsequent hearing on September 10, 1993, the natural father of Phillip filed a consent to terminate his parental rights as authorized by W. Va. Code, 49-6-7 (1977).See footnote 2 The circuit court ruled that this termination vested the father's rights as the natural parent with the Department. The Department requested that it be given permanent custody of Phillip with leave to place the child for adoption. The circuit court declined to do this and awarded only temporary custody. It ruled that Mr. and Mrs. Gorman had an interest in the matter because of the mother's consent to adopt, but the Gormans were not parties to the proceedings. Therefore, the case was dismissed, and this appeal followed.

The Department argues that the mother's consent to adopt should be treated as a consensual termination of parental rights under W. Va. Code, 49-6-7.See footnote 3 This section is part of an article dealing with procedures for parental child abuse and neglect cases in W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq. It is apparent that this type of an agreement placed as it is in the abuse and neglect article primarily is designed to permit a parent charged with abuse and neglect to surrender his parental rights to the Department rather than contest the charges. This type of termination was done by the natural father in this case who surrendered his parental rights to the Department.

The mother's consent to the adoption of Phillip by the Gormans must be viewed as a consent to adopt under W. Va. Code, 48- 4-3 (1985), which relates to procedures for the adoption of a child. Under W. Va. Code, 48-4-3(a), the consent of the mother and legal or determined father to adopt the child ordinarily is required. In W. Va. Code, 48-4-3(c), it is recognized that parental consent is not required if they "have been deprived of the custody of the person of such child by law[.]"See footnote 4 This section goes on to enumerate the persons who may give such consent. The logical inference is that where custody has been removed by law from a parent, consent is not only unnecessary, but legally insufficient. In this case, custody of Phillip was granted to the Department at the time of the filing of the abuse and neglect petition, which was before the consent to adopt was signed.

Of perhaps greater significance is the following language in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6), which deals with the disposition by a court of a case involving a neglected or abused child and provides, in part: "No adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final." This language is designed to forestall any attempt by anyone to obtain custody of an abused or neglected child through adoption until there is a final disposition of the abuse and neglect case by the circuit court. Thus, the consent to adopt given by Jacqueline F. is a nugatory act until the final disposition of this case.

From the foregoing provisions, we conclude that where a child abuse and neglect proceeding has been filed against a parent, such parent may not confer any rights on a third party by executing a consent to adopt during the pendency of the proceeding.

In this case, the circuit court was correct in determining that the mother's rights to the child were terminated. This termination was not because of the consent to adopt, but because of the evidence from the Department that the mother could not demonstrate the capacity to correct the conditions that led to the initial abuse and neglect of Phillip.

On remand, the circuit court should place permanent custody of Phillip with the Department. It should direct the Department to consider whether the best interests of Phillip would be served by permitting him to be adopted by the foster parents, the Ihles, or to be adopted by the Gormans who previously adopted his sibling.

In the event that the Department determines that permanent placement with the Ihles is in the best interests of Phillip, an additional issue which should be considered is the right of Phillip to continued association with his sibling who was previously adopted by the Gormans. As this Court first recognized in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 452, 388 S.E.2d 322, 325 (1989), the need for

"continued contact with other significant figures in . . . [a child's] life," may require the establishment of visitation rights between a child and other persons who qualify as "significant figures." (Footnote omitted). We explained that "'[v]isitation is not solely for the benefit of the adult visitor but is aimed at fulfilling what many conceive to be a vital, or at least a wholesome contribution to the child's emotional well being by permitting partial continuation of an earlier established close relationship.'" 182 W. Va. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 325, quoting Looper v. McManus, 581 P.2d 487, 488 (Okla. Ct. App. 1978).

We expanded on these concepts in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), by holding in Syllabus Point 4:

> "In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact."

Similarly, in the event that Phillip and his sibling are not placed with the same family, the circuit court should consider whether it would be in the best interests of Phillip to establish and order a right to visitation between Phillip and his sibling in the interest of facilitating continued association between these two siblings.

Obviously, this is not an easy task, especially in a situation such as this where two competing sets of parents have strong emotional feelings invested in this child. But in such event, the Department and these parents should struggle mightily to put aside all rancor and work to foster a continued relationship between these children, with the Department providing continued services such as counseling to help facilitate this goal.

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm, in part, and reverse, in part, the final order of the Circuit Court of Jackson County and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed, in part, and remanded.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Marion County entered on June 5, 2003. Pursuant to that order, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the appellant, Rose J.,[1] and her husband, Troy J. to their daughter, Amber Leigh J. Although the court did not terminate the parental rights of Rose and Troy to their son, James Jack J., the court did order that he remain in the legal and physical custody of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"). The court further provided that Rose and Troy would be permitted to have supervised visitation with James. In this appeal, Rose contends that the circuit court erred by terminating her parental rights to Amber and granting permanent custody of James to the DHHR.[2]

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the final order is affirmed.

[1]We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the parties rather than their full names. See In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303 n.1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n.1 (1989). For ease of reading this opinion, after the parties are initially identified, they will thereafter be referred to by their first name only.

[2]Troy appealed the circuit court's final order on February 25, 2004, and this Court refused his petition for appeal on June 24, 2004.

I.

FACTS

The DHHR began providing services to Rose and Troy in 1998, after receiving several reports that their children, Amber, born September 6, 1992, and James, born November 4, 1988, were suffering from chronic lice, were missing numerous days of school as a result thereof, and generally appeared dirty and unkempt. Upon visiting the family home, the DHHR found the house filthy with rotten food and beer cans everywhere. The house was also infested with roaches and black flies. Within a couple days, Rose improved the cleanliness of the home. However, approximately one month later, the DHHR received another referral concerning the family. This time it was reported that school books had been sent home with the children and were returned full of bugs. Over the next few years, the DHHR continued to receive similar reports.[3] Several attempts were made to help the family rectify the lice problem, but the parents refused the assistance offered to them by school personnel and the DHHR.

Finally, on December 18, 2001, the DHHR filed a petition alleging that both children had been the victims of chronic neglect since 1998. The DHHR sought legal but not physical custody of the children at that time. An adjudicatory hearing was held on February 5, 2002, and the court found that Amber had been neglected.[4] However, the petition with regard to James was dismissed because there was no clear and convincing evidence that he had been abused or neglected.

[3]There was an allegation made in 1999, that a bag a marihuana was found on top of the refrigerator in the home. The record also indicates that the parents have a history of alcohol abuse.

Thereafter, on March 21, 2002, the DHHR was advised that Amber was still attending school while infested with lice. The DHHR concluded that the lice problem had escalated since the filing of the petition. Accordingly, Amber was removed from the home and placed in foster care.

Subsequently, on June 24, 2002, the DHHR was advised that Amber told her foster mother that she had been sexually abused. An investigation commenced. Amber indicated that she had been sexually abused by her mother, Rose, her father, Troy, her brother James, and a friend of her brother, Steven H. Amber was interviewed by two experts with several years experience in the field of child abuse. Her reports of being sexually abused were found to be credible. As a result, the DHHR amended its petition, adding allegations of sexual abuse of Amber. The DHHR also requested that James be removed from the home and placed in foster care because he was at risk of being sexually abused.

[4]The evidence showed that Amber had chonic lice and enuresis. She had missed twenty-four days of school between September and December 2001.

A second adjudicatory hearing was held on September 12, 2002. The court made a finding of abandonment on the part of the parents since they had left the State after the children had been removed from their home and not maintained contact with the DHHR.[5] Nonetheless, the court granted a 90-day improvement period.

The disposition hearing was held on April 1, 2003. The court found that the parents had abandoned the children and refused to participate in a reasonable family case plan. The court concluded that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected in the near future. Accordingly, Rose and Troy's parental rights to Amber were terminated. In addition, James was placed in the permanent custody of the DHHR. However, pursuant to James' request, the parental rights of Rose and Troy to James were not terminated, and the court ordered that James could request supervised visits with his parents. The court also provided that visits between James and Amber would be permitted when Amber felt comfortable with the visitation.[6] The court's final order was entered on June 5, 2003, and this appeal followed.

[5]Apparently, Rose and Troy left West Virginia because of Troy's job. He was transferred to another location out of state.

[6]Amber and James were placed in different foster homes because Amber reported that James had sexually abused her.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court explained in In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000) that, "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." Also, in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court held that:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With these standards in mind, we now consider whether the circuit court erred in this case.

III.

DISCUSSION

We will discuss Rose's assignments of error as they relate to each child.

A. Amber

Rose first asserts that the circuit court erred by finding that she sexually abused Amber. She contends that Amber's statements about the sexual abuse are "suspect and unbelievable." In support of this contention, Rose notes that Amber told psychologist John Todd that her mother fondled her one time, but she told a DHHR worker that it happened several times. Rose points out that Amber's physical exam was normal, and that Amber never reported any sexual abuse until she was placed in foster care with another sexually abused child. Thus, Rose asserts that the court's finding that she sexually abused Amber was erroneous.

Having thoroughly reviewed the record in this case, we believe that there was clear and convincing evidence that Amber was sexually abused. In that regard, testimony was provided at the adjudicatory hearing by two experts in the field of child sexual abuse, Kerry Jones and John B. Todd. Each expert had several years experience interviewing and evaluating sexually abused children.[7] Both experts opined that Amber had been sexually abused by her mother, father, brother, and a friend of her brother. The experts testified that they reached this conclusion based upon the details Amber provided. They explained that Amber gave specific and concrete details as to what happened, demonstrating that she had sexual knowledge that she could not have had unless she was abused.

Although Amber's physical examination was normal, both experts stated that this did not indicate that the sexual abuse had not occurred. The experts also pointed out that Amber suffers from enuresis, which is common among children who have been sexually abused. Finally, Amber's disclosure of the abuse to various persons was generally consistent. She did tell Kerry Jones that her mother fondled her many times, but indicated to John Todd that it happened only once. Nonetheless, both experts said they believed that Rose had sexually abused Amber. Furthermore, both experts testified that Amber told them that her mother knew that her father and brother were sexually abusing her, but did not try to stop them. Based on all the above, we cannot say that the court erred by finding that Rose sexually abused Amber or knowingly permitted such abuse to occur.

[7]Kerry Jones has been employed by the West Virginia University Department of Pediatrics for seven years. He is Coordinator of the Child Abuse Services Team and routinely evaluates sexually abused children. John B. Todd is a licensed psychologist in private practice. He has twenty years of experience in the field of child abuse.

Likewise, we do not believe the court erred by terminating Rose's parental rights to Amber. This Court has held that:

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus Point 4, In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989).

In addition, this Court has declared that:

> "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened ...." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus Point 7, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Finally,

> "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Syllabus Point 5, West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

As set forth above, Rose has and continues to deny that Amber was sexually abused by her or anyone else despite clear and convincing evidence to the contrary. In Doris S., this Court explained that:

> Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

197 W.Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874. Consequently, it is clear that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future.

Moreover, Rose did not utilize any of the services offered to her by the DHHR, nor did she participate in the family case plan. In fact, after her children were removed from her home, Rose left West Virginia because her husband obtained employment in another state. She did not maintain contact with the DHHR or even attempt to get in touch with her children. She did not attend any hearings until the final disposition, and she failed to appear at the multidisciplinary team meetings. Rose simply did not make any effort to be reunited with her children.

It is clear to this Court that Amber's welfare would be seriously threatened if she were returned to her mother's custody. Thus, we affirm the circuit court's order terminating Rose's parental rights to Amber.

B. James

Rose also contends that the court erred by adjudicating James as an abused and neglected child based on abandonment. Following the adjudicatory hearing held on September 12, 2002, the court entered an order finding that James was "an abandoned child as defined by the W.Va. Code." Rose contends that there was no evidence that she ever intended to forego all duties and relinquish all parental claims to James. She only left West Virginia to go live with her husband who had a job in Kansas[8] after James was removed from her custody. Thus, Rose concludes that the court erred by finding that she abandoned James.

[8]The record indicates that Rose and Troy also resided in North Carolina and Ohio during the course of these proceedings.

While Rose may not have "abandoned" James as defined by statute,[9] the record still supports a finding that James was an abused child. As discussed above, there was clear and convincing evidence presented at the adjudicatory hearing showing that Amber was sexually abused. While there was no evidence that James was also a victim of sexual abuse by his parents, this Court has held that:

> Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Syllabus Point 2, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). Thus, we affirm the circuit court's finding that James was abused within the meaning of W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(a).[10]

[9]W.Va. Code § 49-6-9 (1980) defines "abandoned" as "to be without supervision or shelter for an unreasonable period of time in light of the child's age and the ability to care for himself or herself in circumstances presenting an immediate threat of serious harm to such child[.]" As noted above, Rose did not leave West Virginia until after James was removed from her custody. Therefore, we cannot say that she had abandoned her son at the time the amended petition was filed in this case.

[10]"This Court may, on appeal, affirm the judgment of the lower court when it appears that such judgment is correct on any legal ground disclosed by the record, regardless of the ground, reason or theory assigned by the lower court as the basis for its judgment." Syllabus Point 3, Barnett v. Wolfolk, 149 W.Va. 246, 140 S.E.2d 466 (1965).

Finally, Rose asserts that the circuit court abused its discretion by placing James in the permanent custody of the DHHR. Rose points out that James said that he wanted to return to his parents' home and that he did not want his parents' parental rights terminated. She further maintains that there was no evidence of abuse or neglect with regard to James, and it was not in his best interests to be placed in permanent foster care.

"In the Court's analysis of child abuse and neglect cases, we must take into consideration the rights and interests of all of the parties in reaching an ultimate resolution of the issues before us." In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (1993). Of course, "the best interests of the child are paramount." Id. In this case, the circuit court abided by James' wishes and did not terminate Rose's parental rights to him. In doing so, the Court relied upon W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2002) which provides that, "Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights."[11]

Having considered all the facts and circumstances of this case as well as the applicable statutory and case law, we agree with the circuit court's decision not to terminate Rose's parental rights to James. We also agree with the circuit court's decision to place

[11]At the time of the disposition hearing, James was fourteen years old.

James in the permanent custody of the DHHR. As with Amber, we believe that James would be at risk for further abuse and neglect if he were returned to Rose's custody. Furthermore, as discussed above, Rose never made any effort to be reunited with her children. The circuit court's decision does allow Rose to continue visitation with James, thereby preserving the parent-child relationship. Thus, we cannot say that the circuit court erred by placing James in permanent foster care.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Marion County entered on June 5, 2003, is affirmed.

SYLLABUS

"When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syllabus Point 5, In Re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Per Curiam:

In this case, Appellant Mildred H.[1] appeals the September 1, 2004, order of the Mineral County Circuit Court that granted a resumption of post-termination visitation of her child, Sierra H., with Sierra H.'s father, Appellee Robert H. For the reasons that follow, we reverse.

I.

FACTS

On December 15, 2000, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereafter "DHHR") received information that Appellee Robert H. had sexually molested Alyssa W., who is the stepdaughter of Robert H. and the daughter of Appellant Mildred H. Alyssa W. is also the half-sister of Sierra H., who is the daughter of both Mildred H. and Robert H. At the time the abuse allegations came to light, Alyssa W. was nine years old and Sierra H. was about a year and two months old. The DHHR case worker who investigated the abuse allegations gave the following testimony in which she related her conversation with Alyssa concerning the alleged abuse:

[1]We follow our practice in cases involving sensitive matters of using initials to identify the parties rather than their full names. Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303 n. 1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n. 1 (1989).

> She told me that her stepfather, Bob, had pulled his pants down, laid [sic] on the couch and told her to sit on his legs. While she was sitting on his legs, he told her to put her hands on his penis, then told her to put her mouth on his penis. She stated that he also put his hands on his penis. She stated that his penis had hair around it. She described in detail what she had seen. She stated that something white had squirted out of his penis into her mouth and also got onto her hands. She stated that, I asked her what happened next and she said I went into the kitchen, and I asked her why she went to the kitchen, and she, she got tears in her eyes, tears welled up in her eyes, and she said to wash that stuff off of my hands. And, she said that it happened on Saturdays while her mother was working.

Also, according to the case worker, Alyssa W. told her that Robert H. had threatened to kill her if she told anyone. Further, Alyssa W. indicated that these instances of sexual abuse had occurred on at least two occasions.

Mildred H. initially did not believe these allegations and, as a result, the DHHR removed both Alyssa W. and Sierra H. from her home. Shortly thereafter, however, Mildred H. moved out of the home she shared with Robert H. She also received counseling and attended parenting classes as part of an improvement plan. Consequently, both Alyssa W. and Sierra H. were returned to Mildred H.

The circuit court found by clear and convincing evidence that Robert H.

sexually assaulted Alyssa W. Because Sierra H. lived in the same household as Alyssa W.,[2] and after finding that it was in Sierra H.'s best interests, the circuit court terminated Robert H.'s parental rights to Sierra H. by order of May 21, 2002. Subsequently, by order of July 19, 2002, the circuit court ordered that Robert H. would have post-termination supervised visitation with Sierra H. for three hours on three Saturdays a month.[3]

In 2001, Robert H. had been charged with one count of first degree sexual

[2]According to W.Va. Code § 49-1-3 (1999),

> (a) "Abused child" means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by: (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or (2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation[.] (Emphasis added).

In Syllabus Point 2 of In Re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court held:

> Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

[3]The circuit court's order notes that Mildred H. would agree to one visit each month on Friday for two hours, but contended that each weekend was too frequent. At a May 29, 2002 hearing, counsel for Mildred H. indicated to the circuit court that his client "reluctantly agreed" to visitation one time per month for two hours, but that Robert H.'s pending criminal trial was a factor that should be considered on the issue of visitation.

assault, one count of first degree sexual abuse, and two counts of sexual abuse by a custodian resulting from his abuse of Alyssa. W. On March 26, 2003, he entered a plea of guilty to six counts of third degree sexual abuse and was sentenced to 90 days incarceration on each of the six counts to be served consecutively. He was incarcerated from August 4, 2003, to June 15, 2004. His last visitation with Sierra H. was just prior to his date of incarceration.

Following Robert H.'s release from incarceration, he moved for reinstatement of his visitation with Sierra H. which was opposed by Mildred H. After two hearings on the matter, the circuit court, by order of September 1, 2004, granted Robert H.'s motion for resumption of visitation with the visits to take place on the first and third Sundays of each month from 3:00 p.m. until 6:00 p.m., beginning on September 12, 2004. In its order, the circuit court held that Mildred H. had the burden of proof to show why visits between Sierra H. and Robert H. should not resume as previously ordered. In support of its decision to resume visitation, the circuit court found in part:

> (a) Visits between [Sierra H.] and Robert [H.] are in the best interests of [Sierra H.] This was shown from evidence that [Sierra H.] had always been excited about seeing her father, Robert [H.], for past visitation, so much so that [Sierra H.] would sometimes cry when she had to leave him or when she thought visitation was going to be cancelled or postponed. Evidence was also presented that during those visits [Sierra H.] and Robert [H.] played and interacted appropriately, got along well, and seemed to enjoy themselves. [Sierra H.] never showed any signs of being afraid of Robert[H.]
> (b) There was only a weak showing that visits between [Sierra H.] and Robert [H.] would be harmful to [Alyssa W.], considering that no one had spoken to [Alyssa W.] in the last > year about her feelings concerning [Sierra H.] visiting with Robert [H.] Secondly, [Alyssa W.'s] past emotional and behavioral issues were not caused simply due to the continued interaction between [Sierra H.] and Robert [H.] Additionally, there was evidence that any fear that [Alyssa W.] had about [Sierra H.] visiting Robert [H.] could be alleviated by full disclosure of the visitation, trust-building between [Alyssa W.] and the supervisor of visitation, and further counseling.

Mildred H. appealed the circuit court's order. On September 9, 2004, this Court stayed visitation between Robert H. and Sierra H. pending resolution of this appeal.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Concerning our standard of review in abuse and neglect cases, in Syllabus 1 of In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court held:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

III.

DISCUSSION

To begin with, we find that the circuit court erred as a matter of law when it placed the burden on Mildred H. to show why visits between Sierra H. and Robert H. should not resume upon Robert H.'s release from incarceration. In the United States Supreme Court case of Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 120 S.Ct. 2054, 147 L.Ed.2d 49 (2000), the Court held that a Washington state statute providing that any person could petition for visitation at any time, allowing the court to order visitation rights for any person when visitation served the best interests of the child, violated the substantive due process rights of the child's mother. The Court explained, "[t]he problem here is not that the Washington Superior Court intervened, but that when it did so, it gave no special weight at all to [the mother's] determination of her daughters' best interests." 530 U.S. at 69, 120 S.Ct. at 2062. This Court recently explained Troxel as follows:

> Thus, Troxel instructs that a judicial determination regarding whether grandparent visitation rights are appropriate may not be premised solely on the best interests of the child analysis. It must also consider and give significant weight to the parents' preference, thus precluding a court from intervening in a fit parent's decision making on a best interests basis.

In Re Grandparent Visitation of Cathy L. v. Brent R., No. 31864, slip op. at 18-19 (May 11, 2005). When we apply the legal principle in Troxel to the instant facts, we find that not only did the circuit court fail to give special weight to the determination of Mildred H., the fit parent herein, regarding Sierra H.'s best interests, but it also improperly placed the burden on her to disprove that Robert H.'s visitation with Sierra H. is not in Sierra H.'s best interests.

In support of her determination that continued post-termination visitation of Robert H. with Sierra H. is not in Sierra H.'s best interests, Mildred H. avers that continued visitation would negatively impact Sierra H.'s relationship with her half-sister Alyssa W., the victim of Robert H.'s sexual abuse. In addition, Mildred H. asserts that continued visitation will unreasonably interfere with Sierra H. and Alyssa W.'s permanent placement with her. Finally, Mildred H. argues that a strong emotional bond has not been established between Sierra H. and Robert H. due to Sierra's age and the fact that she has not seen Robert H. for more than a year.

We agree with Mildred H. Concerning post-termination visitation, this Court held in Syllabus Point 5 of In Re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995) that,

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

This Court's holding in Christina L. is a simple recognition that "even where termination of parental rights is justified, a continued relationship between parent and child by means of post-termination visitation may be valuable to the child's emotional well-being." State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 260, 470 S.E.2d 205, 214 (1996) (citation omitted). To that end, it should be emphasized that post-termination visitation "could be ordered not as a right of the parent, but rather as a right of the child." In Re Christina L., 194 W.Va. at 455 n. 9, 460 S.E.2d at 701 n. 9 (citations omitted). Specifically, "[i]t is the right of the child to continued association with those with whom he shares an emotional bond which governs the decision." In Re Billy Joe M., 206 W.Va. 1, 5 n. 10, 521 S.E.2d 173, 177 n. 10 (1999). Finally, this Court has stated that post-termination visitation should be allowed if it is in the children's best interest and "would not unreasonably interfere with their permanent placement." State ex rel. Amy M., 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214.

Regarding the issue of whether Sierra H. has established a strong emotional bond with Robert H., we are left with the definite and firm conviction that the circuit court committed error. The circuit court merely found, as set forth above, that,

> [Sierra H.] had always been excited about seeing her father, Robert [H.], for past visitation, so much so that [Sierra H.] would sometimes cry when she had to leave him or when she thought visitation was going to be cancelled or postponed. Evidence was also presented that during those visits [Sierra H.] and Robert [H.] played and interacted appropriately, got along well, and seemed to enjoy themselves. [Sierra H.] never showed any signs of being afraid of Robert [H.]

We believe that the evidence relied upon by the circuit court is inadequate to establish that Sierra H. developed a close emotional bond with Robert. H.[4] Frankly, the fact that Sierra was only fourteen months old when the instant proceedings commenced below and the fact that her subsequent contact with Robert H. was limited to regular visits are alone sufficient to cast serious doubt on the notion that Sierra H. developed the enduring and emotionally intimate relationship with Robert H. inherent in the phrase "close emotional bond."

Our cases indicate that a close emotional bond generally takes several years to develop. Thus, the possibility of post-termination visitation is usually considered in cases involving children significantly older than Sierra H. For example, in In Re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), this Court found that the circuit court was required to determine whether post-termination visitation should be granted where the child was five

[4]Sierra H.'s guardian ad litem, who recommends continued visitation, although reduced from that ordered by the circuit court, opines in her brief to this Court:

> After visits three times per month from May 31, 2002 until August 4, 2003, certainly one can surmise that a bond had already formed by the time Robert H. was incarcerated, if it hadn't already, keeping in mind that Robert H. lived with Sierra H. from her birth until she was removed from the home at fourteen months of age. Although there is no evidence submitted by the service providers, common sense would tell you that children form bonds with their parents from birth. Robert H. had consistent contact with Sierra from birth until he was incarcerated.

Such speculation simply does not support a resumption of post-termination visitation under the facts of this case.

years of age. In In the Matter of Elizabeth A.D. v. Hammack, 201 W.Va. 158, 494 S.E.2d 925 (1997), this Court determined that the circuit court's denial of post-termination visitation was clearly erroneous in light of evidence of a close emotional bond between a 13-year-old child and her mother. Finally, in In Re Billy Joe M., supra, we found that remand was proper for an additional evaluation regarding the potential for post-termination visitation where one child was 12 and the other was 10 years of age at the time the neglect and abuse petition was filed.

Also, as set forth above, before ordering post-termination visitation, a circuit court should consider whether such visitation would unreasonably interfere with the child's permanent placement. It is apparent to this Court that continued visitation would unreasonably interfere with the household in which both Sierra H. and Alyssa W. reside with their mother. According to Alyssa W.'s guardian ad litem, she has indicated that she does not believe that Robert H. should have any further contact with her half-sister, Sierra H.[5] This is certainly understandable. Frankly, it is difficult for this Court to imagine that Sierra H.'s continued visitation with Robert H., the man who sexually abused Alyssa W., would not cause considerable and unreasonable stress and be disruptive to the sibling relationship shared by Sierra H. and Alyssa W. Obviously, such stress and disruption would negatively impact the entire household to the detriment of both Sierra H. and Alyssa W.

[5]Alyssa W.'s guardian ad litem has recommended that visitation between Sierra H. and Robert H. not be continued.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Therefore, based on our discussion above, this Court finds that there is an insufficient showing of a close emotional bond established between Sierra H. and Robert H. to support the resumption of post-termination visitation. Also, giving special weight to the determination of Mildred H., the fit parent herein, regarding Sierra H.'s best interests, and considering the unreasonable interference continued visitation is likely to have on Sierra H.'s permanent placement, we conclude that continued post-termination visitation is not appropriate in this case. Accordingly, we reverse the September 1, 2004, order of the Circuit Court of Mineral County that directed the resumption of post-termination visitation of Robert H. with Sierra H.

Reversed.

Albright, Chief Justice, concurring in part and dissenting in part:

I concur with the majority's conclusion that the trial court abused its discretion by placing the burden upon Mildred H. to demonstrate why visitation should not be resumed between the Robert H. and Sierra H. There is no basis upon which the trial court may impose such a burden. It was improper.

I dissent, however, to the extent that this Court has substituted its own judgment for that of the trial court on the issue of the best interests of the child. The trial court engaged in substantial investigation of the best interests of Sierra regarding potential supervised visitation with her father. The trial court sought to assure that the safety of the child would be protected by ordering that the visitation be supervised.[1] This Court has consistently cautioned that substantial discretion must be vested in trial courts and that this Court should not merely substitute its own judgment for that of the trial court in such discretionary matters. That is the essence of the abuse of discretion standard, a model given lip service by the majority but then hastily cast aside when the majority chose an opposite conclusion. Whether in the context of this case or the myriad of others confronted by this Court, this Court's variable application of the abuse of discretion standard is paralyzing that standard's effectiveness. As Justice Cleckley once observed, "the abuse of discretion standard has many faces and, in our application of the standard, it can range anywhere from careful scrutiny to almost no scrutiny." State v. Head, 198 W.Va. 298, 305, 480 S.E.2d 507, 514 (1996) (Cleckley, J., concurring).

The question is not what this Court would have done if sitting on the trial court bench. The question is whether the trial court abused its discretion in the action it took. See Bartles v. Hinkle, 196 W.Va. 381, 389-90, 472 S.E.2d 827, 835-36 (1996) ("the question is not whether we would have imposed a more lenient penalty had we been the trial court, but whether the trial court abused its discretion in imposing the sanction"). In Gribben v. Kirk, 195 W.Va. 488, 466 S.E.2d 147 (1995), this Court explained the abuse of discretion standard as follows: "Under the abuse of discretion standard, we will not disturb a circuit court's decision unless the circuit court makes a clear error of judgment or exceeds the bounds of permissible choices in the circumstances." 195 W.Va. at 500, 466 S.E.2d at 159; see also Gentry v. Mangum, 195 W.Va. 512, 520 n.6, 466 S.E.2d 171, 179 n.6 (1995) ("In general, an abuse of discretion occurs when a material factor deserving significant weight is ignored, when an improper factor is relied upon, or when all proper and no improper factors are assessed but the circuit court makes a serious mistake in weighing them").

Aside from the initial use of a former girlfriend to supervise visitation, nothing in the record suggests that the trial court made a clear error of judgment in allowing such supervised visitation or that the trial court exceeded permissible choices, ignored a material factor, relied upon an improper one, or made a serious mistake in weighing the proper factors.

Accordingly, I dissent from the judgment of this Court depriving the trial judge of his discretion without cause.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Marion County entered on June 5, 2003. Pursuant to that order, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the appellant, Rose J.,[1] and her husband, Troy J. to their daughter, Amber Leigh J. Although the court did not terminate the parental rights of Rose and Troy to their son, James Jack J., the court did order that he remain in the legal and physical custody of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"). The court further provided that Rose and Troy would be permitted to have supervised visitation with James. In this appeal, Rose contends that the circuit court erred by terminating her parental rights to Amber and granting permanent custody of James to the DHHR.[2]

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the final order is affirmed.

[1]We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the parties rather than their full names. See In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303 n.1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n.1 (1989). For ease of reading this opinion, after the parties are initially identified, they will thereafter be referred to by their first name only.

[2]Troy appealed the circuit court's final order on February 25, 2004, and this Court refused his petition for appeal on June 24, 2004.

I.

FACTS

The DHHR began providing services to Rose and Troy in 1998, after receiving several reports that their children, Amber, born September 6, 1992, and James, born November 4, 1988, were suffering from chronic lice, were missing numerous days of school as a result thereof, and generally appeared dirty and unkempt. Upon visiting the family home, the DHHR found the house filthy with rotten food and beer cans everywhere. The house was also infested with roaches and black flies. Within a couple days, Rose improved the cleanliness of the home. However, approximately one month later, the DHHR received another referral concerning the family. This time it was reported that school books had been sent home with the children and were returned full of bugs. Over the next few years, the DHHR continued to receive similar reports.[3] Several attempts were made to help the family rectify the lice problem, but the parents refused the assistance offered to them by school personnel and the DHHR.

Finally, on December 18, 2001, the DHHR filed a petition alleging that both children had been the victims of chronic neglect since 1998. The DHHR sought legal but not physical custody of the children at that time. An adjudicatory hearing was held on February 5, 2002, and the court found that Amber had been neglected.[4] However, the petition with regard to James was dismissed because there was no clear and convincing evidence that he had been abused or neglected.

Thereafter, on March 21, 2002, the DHHR was advised that Amber was still attending school while infested with lice. The DHHR concluded that the lice problem had escalated since the filing of the petition. Accordingly, Amber was removed from the home and placed in foster care.

Subsequently, on June 24, 2002, the DHHR was advised that Amber told her foster mother that she had been sexually abused. An investigation commenced. Amber indicated that she had been sexually abused by her mother, Rose, her father, Troy, her brother James, and a friend of her brother, Steven H. Amber was interviewed by two experts with several years experience in the field of child abuse. Her reports of being sexually abused were found to be credible. As a result, the DHHR amended its petition, adding allegations of sexual abuse of Amber. The DHHR also requested that James be removed from the home and placed in foster care because he was at risk of being sexually abused.

[4]The evidence showed that Amber had chonic lice and enuresis. She had missed twenty-four days of school between September and December 2001.

A second adjudicatory hearing was held on September 12, 2002. The court made a finding of abandonment on the part of the parents since they had left the State after the children had been removed from their home and not maintained contact with the DHHR.[5] Nonetheless, the court granted a 90-day improvement period.

The disposition hearing was held on April 1, 2003. The court found that the parents had abandoned the children and refused to participate in a reasonable family case plan. The court concluded that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected in the near future. Accordingly, Rose and Troy's parental rights to Amber were terminated. In addition, James was placed in the permanent custody of the DHHR. However, pursuant to James' request, the parental rights of Rose and Troy to James were not terminated, and the court ordered that James could request supervised visits with his parents. The court also provided that visits between James and Amber would be permitted when Amber felt comfortable with the visitation.[6] The court's final order was entered on June 5, 2003, and this appeal followed.

[5]Apparently, Rose and Troy left West Virginia because of Troy's job. He was transferred to another location out of state.

[6]Amber and James were placed in different foster homes because Amber reported that James had sexually abused her.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court explained in In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000) that, "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." Also, in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court held that:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With these standards in mind, we now consider whether the circuit court erred in this case.

III.

DISCUSSION

We will discuss Rose's assignments of error as they relate to each child.

A. Amber

Rose first asserts that the circuit court erred by finding that she sexually abused Amber. She contends that Amber's statements about the sexual abuse are "suspect and unbelievable." In support of this contention, Rose notes that Amber told psychologist John Todd that her mother fondled her one time, but she told a DHHR worker that it happened several times. Rose points out that Amber's physical exam was normal, and that Amber never reported any sexual abuse until she was placed in foster care with another sexually abused child. Thus, Rose asserts that the court's finding that she sexually abused Amber was erroneous.

Having thoroughly reviewed the record in this case, we believe that there was clear and convincing evidence that Amber was sexually abused. In that regard, testimony was provided at the adjudicatory hearing by two experts in the field of child sexual abuse, Kerry Jones and John B. Todd. Each expert had several years experience interviewing and evaluating sexually abused children.[7] Both experts opined that Amber had been sexually abused by her mother, father, brother, and a friend of her brother. The experts testified that they reached this conclusion based upon the details Amber provided. They explained that Amber gave specific and concrete details as to what happened, demonstrating that she had sexual knowledge that she could not have had unless she was abused.

Although Amber's physical examination was normal, both experts stated that this did not indicate that the sexual abuse had not occurred. The experts also pointed out that Amber suffers from enuresis, which is common among children who have been sexually abused. Finally, Amber's disclosure of the abuse to various persons was generally consistent. She did tell Kerry Jones that her mother fondled her many times, but indicated to John Todd that it happened only once. Nonetheless, both experts said they believed that Rose had sexually abused Amber. Furthermore, both experts testified that Amber told them that her mother knew that her father and brother were sexually abusing her, but did not try to stop them. Based on all the above, we cannot say that the court erred by finding that Rose sexually abused Amber or knowingly permitted such abuse to occur.

[7]Kerry Jones has been employed by the West Virginia University Department of Pediatrics for seven years. He is Coordinator of the Child Abuse Services Team and routinely evaluates sexually abused children. John B. Todd is a licensed psychologist in private practice. He has twenty years of experience in the field of child abuse.

Likewise, we do not believe the court erred by terminating Rose's parental rights to Amber. This Court has held that:

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus Point 4, In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989).

In addition, this Court has declared that:

> "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened ...." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus Point 7, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Finally,

> "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Syllabus Point 5, West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

As set forth above, Rose has and continues to deny that Amber was sexually abused by her or anyone else despite clear and convincing evidence to the contrary. In Doris S., this Court explained that:

> Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

197 W.Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874. Consequently, it is clear that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future.

Moreover, Rose did not utilize any of the services offered to her by the DHHR, nor did she participate in the family case plan. In fact, after her children were removed from her home, Rose left West Virginia because her husband obtained employment in another state. She did not maintain contact with the DHHR or even attempt to get in touch with her children. She did not attend any hearings until the final disposition, and she failed to appear at the multidisciplinary team meetings. Rose simply did not make any effort to be reunited with her children.

It is clear to this Court that Amber's welfare would be seriously threatened if she were returned to her mother's custody. Thus, we affirm the circuit court's order terminating Rose's parental rights to Amber.

B. James

Rose also contends that the court erred by adjudicating James as an abused and neglected child based on abandonment. Following the adjudicatory hearing held on September 12, 2002, the court entered an order finding that James was "an abandoned child as defined by the W.Va. Code." Rose contends that there was no evidence that she ever intended to forego all duties and relinquish all parental claims to James. She only left West Virginia to go live with her husband who had a job in Kansas[8] after James was removed from her custody. Thus, Rose concludes that the court erred by finding that she abandoned James.

[8]The record indicates that Rose and Troy also resided in North Carolina and Ohio during the course of these proceedings.

While Rose may not have "abandoned" James as defined by statute,[9] the record still supports a finding that James was an abused child. As discussed above, there was clear and convincing evidence presented at the adjudicatory hearing showing that Amber was sexually abused. While there was no evidence that James was also a victim of sexual abuse by his parents, this Court has held that:

> Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Syllabus Point 2, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). Thus, we affirm the circuit court's finding that James was abused within the meaning of W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(a).[10]

[9]W.Va. Code § 49-6-9 (1980) defines "abandoned" as "to be without supervision or shelter for an unreasonable period of time in light of the child's age and the ability to care for himself or herself in circumstances presenting an immediate threat of serious harm to such child[.]" As noted above, Rose did not leave West Virginia until after James was removed from her custody. Therefore, we cannot say that she had abandoned her son at the time the amended petition was filed in this case.

[10]"This Court may, on appeal, affirm the judgment of the lower court when it appears that such judgment is correct on any legal ground disclosed by the record, regardless of the ground, reason or theory assigned by the lower court as the basis for its judgment." Syllabus Point 3, Barnett v. Wolfolk, 149 W.Va. 246, 140 S.E.2d 466 (1965).

Finally, Rose asserts that the circuit court abused its discretion by placing James in the permanent custody of the DHHR. Rose points out that James said that he wanted to return to his parents' home and that he did not want his parents' parental rights terminated. She further maintains that there was no evidence of abuse or neglect with regard to James, and it was not in his best interests to be placed in permanent foster care.

"In the Court's analysis of child abuse and neglect cases, we must take into consideration the rights and interests of all of the parties in reaching an ultimate resolution of the issues before us." In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (1993). Of course, "the best interests of the child are paramount." Id. In this case, the circuit court abided by James' wishes and did not terminate Rose's parental rights to him. In doing so, the Court relied upon W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2002) which provides that, "Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights."[11]

Having considered all the facts and circumstances of this case as well as the applicable statutory and case law, we agree with the circuit court's decision not to terminate Rose's parental rights to James. We also agree with the circuit court's decision to place

[11]At the time of the disposition hearing, James was fourteen years old.

James in the permanent custody of the DHHR. As with Amber, we believe that James would be at risk for further abuse and neglect if he were returned to Rose's custody. Furthermore, as discussed above, Rose never made any effort to be reunited with her children. The circuit court's decision does allow Rose to continue visitation with James, thereby preserving the parent-child relationship. Thus, we cannot say that the circuit court erred by placing James in permanent foster care.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Marion County entered on June 5, 2003, is affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance." Syl. Pt. 1, Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979).

2. Prohibition is available to abused and/or neglected children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of a greater extent and duration than permitted under West Virginia Code 49-6-2(b) and 49-6-5(c) (1995).

3. There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code 49-6-5(a) (1995) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

Workman, Justice:
This case is before the Court on a petition for a writ of prohibition and mandamus against the Honorable Tod J. Kaufman, Judge of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, by the Petitioners, Amy M., Shane B., II, Jesse B., Matthew B., and Travis B., See footnote 1 all children who are the subjects of the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings, and the State of West Virginia. Betty Jo B. and Shane B., parents of the petitioning minors, are also named as Respondents. Both the State and the children's guardian ad litem See footnote 2 seek relief from a November 20, 1995 order, in which the Respondent judge ordered a post-adjudicatory improvement period for the Respondent mother, Betty Jo B. Petitioners contend that an additional improvement period is not in the best interests of the children. They ask this Court to prohibit the circuit court from enforcing the order granting a post-adjudicatory improvement period, and to order the circuit court to set this matter immediately for final disposition pursuant to West Virginia Code 49-6-5 (1995). We agree with the petitioners' contentions, and award the writ requested.

I.
FACTS

Betty Jo B. is a twenty-three-year-old mother of five, now pregnant with her sixth child. The children range in age from two to seven. Shane B. is the father of four of the children, and is alleged to be the father of the fifth as well. The parents are separated, and have not lived together since shortly after the birth of the youngest children, who are twins. Shane B. has had no contact with any of the children since June, 1994.

From the standpoint of legal intervention, this case began on February 1, 1994, when the police responded to a call from a family friend, who stated that he was caring for two of the children and refused to do so any longer. The friend related that Mrs. B. had asked him to watch the children while she went out to cash a check. When she had not returned by the following day, he called the police. The police found the children living in conditions they described as "beyond belief," including human excrement in the toilet, all over a potty chair and smeared on the walls; broken glass, trash, food, and dirty diapers strewn throughout the house; a filthy bathroom; urine-stained beds with no sheets; and a large kitchen knife on the bedroom floor. The children, then aged eight months to five years, had no food, and what little clothing they had was extremely dirty. All were badly infested with head lice, and ill to varying degrees. The police took emergency custody of the children immediately.

Prior to this incident, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") had documented several incidents of police, medical, and social service intervention dating back to April 15, 1991. Relatives and neighbors had taken the children to local hospitals more than once, posing as Betty Jo B. Apparently the mother was afraid to seek medical attention for them, fearing reprisals from the welfare authorities. At one time the older children were sleeping on a box on the floor, while the infant twins, who had no cribs, slept in a car seat and a baby swing. There were also reports of numerous abandonments for days at a time without adequate provision for food, diapers, or supervision of the children. A child protective services worker who was sent to the home in July, 1993, testified to deplorable living conditions at that time, including no beds, no food, ill children, and generally unsanitary conditions. A nurse who examined Amy M. in November, 1993, testified that the child had a urinary tract infection so severe that it had the potential for serious long-term consequences. To make matters worse, she was wearing dirty clothing and "filthy little underpanties," and was accompanied to the emergency room by a mother who was so obviously intoxicated that the nurse felt it necessary to call a neighbor and a cab just to get the child home safely.

The Circuit Court of Kanawha County granted an initial pre-adjudicatory improvement period, then extended it on three subsequent occasions, so that eventually improvement periods spanned almost two years, from February 10, 1994, through November 1, 1995. We review the conditions and results of those improvement periods in some detail here, as these facts are relevant to our decision.

The circuit court issued its first order on February 10, 1994, ten days after the children were removed from the home and six days after a petition alleging abuse and neglect was filed. Both parents were represented by counsel, and both waived their right to a preliminary hearing. The Circuit Court granted temporary custody to DHHR, directed DHHR to prepare a family case plan to identify existing problems and propose a course of action within thirty days, and ordered a psychological evaluation of the mother, substance abuse evaluations of both parents, parenting classes for the mother, and medical and psychological evaluations of each of the children. The court granted the parents' motion for an improvement period, to begin February 10, 1994, and end May 10, 1994. During this time, the parents were directed to comply with the investigations and evaluations outlined in the order, and were granted supervised visitation with the children for one hour each week.

The court held a status review on May 27, 1994, soon after the end of the first improvement period. The court observed that both parents had visited the children consistent with the original order, that the mother had obtained a psychological evaluation and had been participating in parenting classes, and that the father had obtained a substance abuse evaluation. Based on this progress, the court expanded both parents' visitation with the children to include in-home unsupervised overnight visitation when DHHR found it to be in the best interests of the children. The circuit court then extended the improvement period for an additional six months, to expire on November 30, 1994, with a status review on June 29, 1994.

The record does not include any documentation from the conference scheduled for June 29, but the next order entered, on November 2, 1994, near the end of the second improvement period, indicates deterioration in the parents' progress toward reunification with their children. Betty Jo B. continued to visit the children, but her participation in parenting class had tapered off. Shane B. had not attended parenting classes at all, and had not visited the children since June. During one unsupervised visit around this time, Betty Jo B. left six-year-old Amy and the one-year-old twins at her mother's house while she took Jesse, age two, and Shane, age four, to a bar. Amy went out on her own, searching for her mother in the bars. The children also reported seeing a boyfriend strike their mother, and the twins returned from one visit with unexplained knots on their heads. The court in the November order tightened up the restrictions on visitation considerably, and set out definite goals to be accomplished prior to the expiration of the improvement period. See footnote 3 It again extended the improvement period, but scheduled an adjudicatory hearing on January 13, 1995. Until this point, the circuit court appears to have adequately monitored the case, and timely reviewed ongoing progress. See footnote 4

There was no adjudicatory hearing on January 13, 1995, but the next order entered, dated March 25, 1995, recites that the improvement period was extended. In the March order, Judge Kaufman found that Betty Jo B. had complied with the terms set out in the November order, and directed her to enroll in a counseling program at DHHR's expense. He also directed continuation of in-home services through Children's Home Society. The judge increased Ms. B's visitation to two hour-long visits per week, with additional overnight visits at least twice each month. In connection with the overnight visits, the court ordered DHHR to provide suitable bedding for the children, and to assist the mother in arranging for structured activities.

Unfortunately, the court's optimism turned out to be unmerited. The following month, after an overnight visit on April 13-14, 1995, the assistant prosecuting attorney for Kanawha County filed a motion to terminate overnight visitation and to set the matter down for adjudication. The motion alleged that although Ms. B. had indicated that she had a playpen for the younger children to sleep in, she did not, and that the children slept on the bare floor despite the efforts of DHHS to have them sleep on blankets. In addition, Jesse had an asthma attack triggered by exposure to cigarette smoke, and the mother was not even present for the whole visit.

It was not until August 29, 1995, four months after the alleged incident, that an adjudicatory hearing was held. See footnote 5 The record before us suggests that this was the first and only evidentiary hearing in a matter that has now gone on for over two years. See footnote 6 At this hearing, Judge Kaufman heard the testimony of Betty Jo B. and witnesses for the State. Based on the evidence adduced at the adjudicatory hearing, the court appears to have concluded that the mother's inability to obtain suitable housing was at the heart of the problem. He ordered DHHR to pay $906 to the public housing authority to cover the cost of damages See footnote 7 to housing she had occupied before becoming homeless. Rather than terminate the improvement period (which had been in effect since February 10, 1994, and was now apparently open-ended), the court directed the State to continue to allow weekly visits by the mother (and the father "if he wishes") and to arrange additional weekend visits with the mother. The order does not specify whether these visits should be supervised. The court took the issue of abuse and neglect under advisement, pending an additional hearing set for September 26, 1995, for arguments of counsel based on the evidence adduced. No hearing took place, however, until November 1, 1995.

Finally, on November 20, 1995, fully one year and nine months after the children were removed from the home, and having exhausted nearly every possibility of parent education and rehabilitation with little or no improvement apparent upon the record, the court made a finding of neglect under West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c) (1995). On the same day, over the vehement objection of both the State and the guardian ad litem, the judge granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period of unspecified duration and with no direction regarding terms or conditions. See footnote 8 Counsel for the State and the guardian ad litem represented to this Court during oral argument that motions were made to reconsider the ruling and to proceed to final disposition, along with requests to present further evidence, including the testimony of a therapist who has been working with the three oldest children. According to counsel, during oral argument before this Court, these motions were denied. See footnote 9

II.
CRITERIA FOR AWARDING A WRIT OF PROHIBITION

Prohibition is an appropriate remedy in cases in which the lower court has no jurisdiction over the subject matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers. W.Va. Code 53-1-1 (1994). Here, the trial court has jurisdiction, so we look to syllabus point one of Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979):

> In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance.

Id. at 112, 262 S.E.2d at 745. Thus "prohibition may be substituted for a writ of error or appeal when the latter alternatives would provide an inadequate remedy." State ex rel. Chafin v. Halbritter, 191 W.Va. 741, 743-44, 448 S.E.2d 428, 430-31 (1994) (citations omitted). Further, this Court has recognized that "[o]ur modern practice is to allow the use of prohibition, based on the particular facts of the case, where a remedy by appeal is unavailable or inadequate, or where irremediable prejudice may result from lack of an adequate interlocutory review." McFoy v. Amerigas, Inc., 170 W.Va. 526, 532, 295 S.E.2d 16, 22 (1982); accord, Chafin, 191 W.Va. at 744, 448 S.E.2d at 431.

As we said in In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 623, 408 S.E.2d 365, 375 (1991), the early, most formative years of a child's life are crucial to his or her development. There would be no adequate remedy at law for these children were they permitted to continue in this abyss of uncertainty. We have repeatedly emphasized that children have a right to resolution of their life situations, to a basic level of nurturance, protection, and security, and to a permanent placement. The legislature has recognized this by limiting the extent and duration of improvement periods a court may grant in an abuse and neglect case. See W.Va. Code 49-6-2(b). Because the lower court violated this clear statutory mandate, and irremediable prejudice may result from the delays inherent in waiting to appeal a final disposition, we find that prohibition is an appropriate remedy in this case. Thus, prohibition is available to abused and/or neglected children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of a greater extent and duration than permitted under West Virginia Code 49-6-2(b) and 49-6-5(c) (1995).

III.

IMPROVEMENT PERIOD

At issue in this case is whether improvement periods in abuse and neglect cases, through extensions and procedural delays, in the face of little evidence indicating real progress, can eventually become so protracted that they violate "clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate." Hinkle, 164 W.Va. at 112, 262 S.E.2d at 745, Syl. Pt. 1. West Virginia Code 49-6-2(b) (1995), in effect during this case, authorizes any parent or custodian to request "an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based." (emphasis added). Further, the statute during the time period relevant to these proceedings directed the court to "allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof . . . ." (emphasis added). This provision sets out a clear statutory mandate that a pre-adjudicatory improvement period not exceed a maximum of twelve months. See footnote 10

Furthermore, we find it important to note that House Bill 4138, passed by the West Virginia Legislature on March 9, 1996, and effective June 8, 1996, revises our law regarding improvement periods by amending West Virginia Code 49-6-2(b) and 49-6-5(c), and adding new 49-6-12. The Legislature's enactment of these provisions establishes a clear statutory mandate to limit pre-adjudicatory improvement periods to three months, and post-adjudicatory improvement periods to six months, with a three-month extension of a post-adjudicatory improvement period possible under certain defined circumstances.

The goal of an improvement period is to facilitate the reunification of families whenever that reunification is in the best interests of the children involved. Both the statute and our case law grant trial courts considerable flexibility in developing meaningful improvement periods designed to address the myriad possible problems causing abuse and neglect. We have held repeatedly, however, that "courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . ." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980); accord, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 629, 408 S.E.2d 365, 381 (1991).

As we explained in West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990), it is possible for an individual to show "compliance with specific aspects of the case plan" while failing "to improve . . . [the] overall attitude and approach to parenting." Thus, a judgment regarding the success of an improvement period is within the court's discretion regardless of whether or not the individual has completed all suggestions or goals set forth in family case plans.

The improvement period is granted to allow the parent an opportunity to remedy the existing problems. The case plan simply provides an approach to solving them. As is clear from the language of the statute, . . . the ultimate goal is restoration of a stable family environment, not simply meeting the requirements of the case plan.

Carlita B., 185 W.Va. at 626, 408 S.E.2d at 378 (quoting, in part, Peggy F., 184 W.Va. at 64, 399 S.E.2d at 464).

When one year had passed from the time the children in this case were removed from the home, this matter was ripe for adjudication. See footnote 11 At that time, although Betty Jo B. had attended her visitations and sporadically attended court-ordered parenting classes, she had made little progress toward being able to provide the children with a safe and healthy living environment. At some point during the improvement period she became homeless. Toward the end of that first year, unsupervised visitation was not going smoothly, and the circuit court still felt the need to place detailed restrictions on visitation, as evidenced by the November 2, 1994, order. When the court set an adjudicatory hearing for January 13, 1995, it acted appropriately.

The problem, as pointed out in Carlita B., is the tendency of cases such as these to fall through the cracks, as this one did. 185 W.Va. at 623, 408 S.E.2d at 375. As noted above, no evidentiary hearing was held in this case until eight months after it was originally scheduled, and the determination of neglect came two months later, on November 20, 1995. Such delays are in clear contravention of the directive in West Virginia Code 49-6-2(d) and case law that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible. See In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377.

To further postpone any permanency decision with regard to these children would be unconscionable. The legislature provided for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period of three to twelve months, and, if appropriate, a post-adjudicatory improvement period of up to twelve months. W.Va. Code 49-6-2(b) & 49-6-5(c). Thus, the pre-adjudicatory improvement period should not have been extended beyond a total of twelve months under any circumstances.

Instead, in this case, five young children have lived in foster care limbo since February 1, 1994, more than two years of their young lives. The relationship between the foster parents and the Respondent mother has grown hostile. The children's behavior has deteriorated in recent months as they feel the uncertainty surrounding their situation. The circuit court's almost total focus on housing in the latter part of the improvement period appears to have ignored more significant parenting problems. Betty Jo B. had housing when this proceeding was initiated, and it did not appear to have aided her parenting skills. The greater concern should have been the mother's ambivalent feelings toward at least one of the children, her pattern of absenting herself from them during visitations, and her lack of cooperation with the plan designed to reunify her with her children. The father's lack of interest seems even more compelling. Upon remand, these and other issues relating to parenting ability should be examined closely.

Because the circuit court's grant of an extended pre-adjudicatory improvement period violated the clear statutory mandate of West Virginia Code 49-6-2(b), because its handling of this case violated the clear mandate of this Court in Carlita B. that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter and must be resolved as expeditiously as possible, see 185 W.Va. at 626, 408 S.E.2d at 378, and because the record demonstrates the children's emotional well-being is rapidly deteriorating, we grant the writ of prohibition to prevent the circuit court of Kanawha County from enforcing its order of an additional post-adjudicatory improvement period in this case. Although West Virginia Code 49-6-5(c) allows a court to grant a post-adjudicatory improvement period of up to twelve months, See footnote 12 the Respondent mother in this case has, as a practical matter, already been granted a total improvement period in excess of the maximum combined pre- and post-adjudicatory improvement periods, and is therefore not entitled to any further improvement periods.

A circuit judge overseeing a case such as this has an immensely difficult task, for in many abuse and neglect cases there is a genuine emotional bond as well as the natural biological bond between parent and child which courts are understandably hesitant to break if there is hope of meaningful change. In most abuse and neglect cases, the parent(s) may have redeeming qualities that create such hope that they will be able to make the necessary changes to become adequate parents. As we said in Carlita B.,

> Certainly many delays [in abuse and neglect cases] are occasioned by the fact that troubled human relationships and aggravated parenting problems are not remedied overnight. The law properly recognizes that rights of natural parents enjoy a great deal of protection and that one of the primary goals of the social services network and the courts is to give aid to parents and children in an effort to reunite them.

> The bulk of the most aggravated procedural delays, however, are occasioned less by the complexities of mending broken people and relationships than by the tendency of these types of cases to fall through the cracks in the system. The long procedural delays in this and most other abuse and neglect cases considered by this Court in the last decade indicate that neither the lawyers nor the courts are doing an adequate job of assuring that children--the most voiceless segment of our society--aren't left to languish in a limbo-like state during a time most crucial to their human development.

Although it is sometimes a difficult task, the trial court must accept the fact that the statutory limits on improvement periods (as well as our case law limiting the right to improvement periods) dictate that there comes a time for decision, because a child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life, and because part of that permanency must include at minimum a right to rely on his or her caretakers to be there to provide the basic nurturance of life.

Justice Cleckley's recent opinion in In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), helped forge the way for courts to recognize that, even where termination of parental rights is justified, a continued relationship between parent and child by means of post-termination visitation may be valuable to the child's emotional well-being. 194 W.Va. at 448, 460 S.E.2d at 694, syl. pt. 5. In the event the court below determines that the parental rights are to be terminated, it may still consider such a continued relationship if it is in the child's or children's best interests, and would not unreasonably interfere with their permanent placement.

IV.
ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE

A second issue is presented by the guardian ad litem's representation during oral argument before this Court that on November 20, 1995, the date the court issued its finding of neglect and ordered the post-adjudicatory improvement period, the respondent judge denied the guardian ad litem's motion to reconsider and her offer to adduce additional evidence. See footnote 13 As we said in Christina L.:

> There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1992), states that the circuit court shall give "both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard" when proceeding to the > disposition of the case. . . . This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

194 W.Va. at 453, 460 S.E.2d at 699. In Christina L., we held that the trial court's refusal to allow the guardian ad litem to submit a proposed dispositional plan at the close of a dispositional hearing was reversible error. Id. at 454, 460 S.E.2d at 700.

Specific guidelines for guardians ad litem in abuse and neglect cases were set out by Justice McHugh in In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162, (1993). Included in those guidelines are the following:

> 16. Subpoena witnesses for hearings or otherwise prepare testimony or cross-examination of witnesses and ensure that relevant material is introduced.
>
> . . .
> 25. File a motion for modification of the dispositional order if a change of circumstances occurs for the child which warrants a modification or represent the child if said motion for modification is filed by any other party.

Id. at 41-42, 435 S.E.2d at 179-80. A trial court should not unreasonably deny a guardian the opportunity to fulfill these responsibilities. However, we do not reach this issue in the instant case, because it was not properly raised prior to oral argument, and because such evidence can be taken on remand.

Based on the foregoing, we hereby issue the writ of prohibition, prohibiting the Circuit Court of Kanawha County from enforcing its order of a post-adjudicatory improvement period in this case, and ordering it hear evidence and to proceed to final disposition as soon as possible pursuant to West Virginia Code 49-6-5. Should the court conclude that termination of parental rights is necessary, it should consider whether post-termination visitation is in the children's best interests.

Writ Granted as Moulded.

Footnote 1 We follow our past practice in domestic and juvenile cases that involve sensitive facts, and do not use the last names of the parties. See State ex rel. West Virginia Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 689, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n.1 (1987).

Footnote 2 We have previously indicated that a guardian ad litem "must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children[,]" including "exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991) (emphasis in original). Guardians ad litem, however, frequently fail to carry out this responsibility. The guardian ad litem in the instant case is to be commended for being aggressive in her representation of these children.

Footnote 3 The November 2, 1994, order provided:
Visitation with the respondent mother may be supervised by the persons providing in-home parenting class, if necessary for the supervision of the children. Further the visitations shall take place at the Department if the persons providing in-home parenting determine that the home is unfit for visitation. However, the visits may be conducted in the home if Ms. B[][.] renders the home safe for the children in the home. During the visitation, Ms. B[][.] shall demonstrate the following:

1. She shall show adequate supervision of all children;
2. She shall have food available for the children;
3. Jeff Blizzard [Ms. B.'s boyfriend] shall not be present at the time of the visitation;
4. The mother shall insure that the home is safe f or the children; and
5. The mother shall not consume or permit any other person to consume alcohol in the presence of the children.

Footnote 4 "Subsequent to the initial formulation of the improvement plan and family case plans, it is imperative that the progress of the parent(s) toward the achievement of enumerated goals be monitored closely." In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 625, 408 S.E.2d 365, 377 (1991). The circuit court initially adhered to this requirement, but eventually lapsed into a pattern of continuing to extend the improvement period even when evidence of any real improvement was clearly diminishing.

Footnote 5 The term "adjudicatory hearing" refers to the hearing at which the court determines whether a child is "abused or neglected." See W. Va. Code 49-6-2(c) (1995).

Footnote 6 The parents in this case waived their right to a preliminary hearing. Ordinarily, the preliminary hearing would be the first opportunity for both sides to present evidence in a custody case. See W.Va. Code 49-6-3(a); 49-6-1 (1995). This case illustrates one of the difficulties created by the continuation of pre-adjudicatory improvement periods beyond the period the statute permits.

Footnote 7 There was difficulty in obtaining housing for the mother because the public housing authority refused to have her as a tenant due to extensive damages to the apartment she had previously rented from them.

Footnote 8 On December 22, 1995, the day after a petition for a writ of prohibition was filed in this Court, the court issued a second order granting a 90-day improvement period to begin on the date of the November hearing, and directing that visitation shall be supervised. The court also directed DHHR to continue in its efforts to obtain suitable housing for Betty Jo B.

Footnote 9 In addition, counsel offered affidavits indicating that Amy M. returned from a Thanksgiving visit with her mother upset and crying, because Betty Jo B. had told Amy she didn't want her anymore; that the mother openly insults the children's foster parents, calls them names, and has threatened to blow up their house; that Amy, age 7, has become so insecure she is asking for a baby bottle; and that Jessie's behavior has become extremely aggressive. Counsel represented during oral argument that the circuit court refused to allow them to introduce this and other evidence.

Footnote 10 In addition, West Virginia Code 49-6-5(c) (1995) provides that the court may, after a finding of abuse or neglect, allow the parents or custodians a post-adjudicatory improvement period not to exceed twelve months as an alternative to terminating parental rights. The latter statute specifically states that "[n]o more than one such post-dispositional improvement period may be granted."

Footnote 11 Twelve months was the statutory maximum for improvement periods. It is quite possible that this case was ready for adjudication sooner, notably at the time of the November 2, 1994, hearing.

Footnote 12 As noted earlier, a recent enactment will restrict post-adjudicatory improvement periods to six months, with a possible three-month extension.

Footnote 13 This evidence, which according to counsel was to include the testimony of a therapist who has been providing services for the three older children, would have given the court insight into the emotional status of the children. Any decision regarding their fate must necessarily take into account the effect upon these children of this protracted period of indecision, and of recent events both in and out of the courtroom.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In reviewing a final order entered by a circuit court judge upon a review of, or upon a refusal to review, a final order of a family court judge, we review the findings of fact made by the family court judge under the clearly erroneous standard, and the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard. We review questions of law de novo." Syllabus, Carr v. Hancock, 216 W. Va. 474, 607 S.E.2d 803 (2004).

2. " 'The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal.' Syllabus point 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W. Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 (2010), which entitles a minor above the age of fourteen to nominate his or her own guardian, applies only after a court has determined, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, that a particular circumstance warrants the appointment of a guardian.

WORKMAN, C.J.:

This case calls upon the Court to interpret West Virginia law governing the appointment of guardians for minors. Specifically, this case involves a minor above the age of fourteen who has nominated a third party, his grandmother, to be his guardian. The guardianship is contested by the minor's non-offending, biological mother. The grandmother contends that West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 (2010) and the case law interpreting it require courts to appoint any guardian nominated by a minor above the age of fourteen, unless the guardian is "unfit." The Circuit Court of Harrison County, West Virginia, refused to interpret the statute in such a manner, however, holding instead that appointing a third party as a guardian for a minor over the objection of a non-offending, biological parent would violate that parent's constitutional right to the custody of his or her own child. Because the petitioners' interpretation of the relevant law is misguided, and because the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in this matter, the ruling below is affirmed.

I. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The child at issue in this case, Antonio R. A.,[1] was born on February 22, 1994. For most of his childhood, from age three until approximately age thirteen, Antonio resided with his maternal grandmother, Carol G., in Harrison County, West Virginia. His father, Jorge A., currently resides out-of-state. Antonio visits his father regularly but has never resided with him. Antonio's mother, Gina H., currently resides in Upshur County, West Virginia, with her husband, Sidney H., and Antonio's two half-siblings born to a prior marriage of Gina H. to Barry B.

In the summer of 2006, when Antonio was approximately thirteen years old, Gina H. brought him to live with her, Sidney H., and Antonio's two half-siblings in Upshur County. This living arrangement lasted approximately three years, until October 25, 2009, when Antonio's former step-father, Barry B., obtained an emergency domestic violence protective order on behalf of Antonio and his half-siblings, removing them from Gina and Sidney H.'s home. At that time, Antonio returned to Carol G.'s home and expressed a desire to have Carol G. become his permanent legal guardian.

On October 29, 2009, Carol G. filed a "Petition for Permanent Guardianship and Emergency Temporary Guardianship" in the Family Court of Harrison County, West Virginia. In that petition, she argued that, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 and Rule 6 of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Minor Guardianship Proceedings, Antonio should be permitted to nominate his own guardian as he is over the age of fourteen. She asserted that she would be a "fit" guardian, as required by statute, and indicated that Antonio's father, Jorge A., intended to waive his priority right to appointment under West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 (2010). Carol G. additionally filed a document entitled "Nomination of Guardian," signed by Antonio and notarized, in which Antonio "nominates and requests" that Carol G. be appointed as his guardian.

On November 16, 2009, the family court ordered that Antonio remain in Carol G.'s care temporarily, until the petition for guardianship could be resolved. On December 9, 2009, Carol G. filed an amended petition for guardianship including allegations of abuse and neglect against Gina and Sidney H.[2]

In the meantime, as a result of the allegations forming the basis for the emergency protective order, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, Division of Child Protective Services, conducted an investigation into the alleged abuse and neglect of all three of Gina H.'s children. In a report submitted to the family court on November 30, 2009, Alison Daugherty, a Child Protective Services worker, concluded that the allegations did not rise to the level of abuse or neglect. She recommended that all three children be returned to the custody of Gina and Sidney H. and that the family participate in family counseling and other family support services.

[2]In the amended guardianship petition, Carol G. alleged that Gina H. had failed to seek certain types of medical care for Antonio and that Sidney H. had engaged in physically aggressive discipline.

In late December, the family court appointed Amy Lanham as Guardian ad Litem for Antonio. On January 29, 2010, Ms. Lanham submitted a report, recommending that Carol G. be appointed as Antonio's guardian, and that Antonio and his mother, Gina H., participate in family counseling. Ms. Lanham asserted that Carol G. would be a "fit" guardian as required by West Virginia Code §§ 44-10-3 & 4.

Following briefing by all parties, the family court, on April 29, 2010, entered an order denying Carol G.'s petition for permanent guardianship. As a basis for its ruling, the family court stated that "this court is not convinced that West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 applies to the granting of guardianship to a third party when the child's parents are alive and fit." The family court concluded that "to claim that a teenager may nominate any person to be his guardian, against his fit parents' wishes, is not only unsupported by the law but it is also unsupported by good sense." The family court then ordered that Antonio be returned to Gina H. following the conclusion of the school year.

Carol G. and Ms. Lanham (hereinafter "the petitioners") filed a joint petition for appeal to the circuit court. On July 8, 2010, the circuit court entered a lengthy order denying the petition for appeal. The circuit court cited In re Abigail Faye, 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008), for the proposition that "fit" parents have a right to the custody of their own children. The circuit court recognized that Carol G. "has provided a loving and nurturing home for much of Antonio's life," but concluded that there is "no basis in law for a child, of any age, to take away his or her own fit parent's right to custody and nominate a third-party guardian . . . ." Thus, it affirmed the family court's order.

The petitioners now ask this Court to reverse the circuit court's order. In addition to briefs filed by the petitioners and the respondent, Gina H., a letter has been filed pro se by Antonio's father, Jorge A., who is also named as a respondent in this case. In that letter, Jorge A. indicates that he supports Antonio's efforts to have Carol G. appointed as his permanent guardian.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court's standard of review for appeals arising from family court decisions is as follows:

> In reviewing a final order entered by a circuit court judge upon a review of, or upon a refusal to review, a final order of a family court judge, we review the findings of fact made by the family court judge under the clearly erroneous standard, and the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard. We review questions of law de novo.

Syllabus, Carr v. Hancock, 216 W. Va. 474, 607 S.E.2d 803 (2004). With regard to custody decisions, including petitions for guardianship, this Court has held:

> The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's > ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal.

Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300, Syl. Pt. 1 (quoting Syl. Pt. 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W. Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989)).

Here, the circuit court affirmed the family court's denial of Carol G.'s guardianship petition on the basis that courts are not permitted to appoint a permanent guardian for a minor child when doing so would effectively divest a non-offending, biological parent of their right to custody. Pursuant to the standards set forth above, this Court will review the lower courts' interpretation of the relevant statutes and case law de novo, but will review the ultimate decision to deny the guardianship petition and return custody of Antonio to Gina H. for abuse of discretion.

III. DISCUSSION

A. Guardianship Statutes

The statutes governing guardianship appointments are found at West Virginia Code §§ 44-10-3 & 4.[3] West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, provides, in relevant part,

[3]These guardianship statutes are contained within Chapter 44 of the West Virginia Code, which pertains to the "Administration of Estates and Trusts," Article 10, which governs "Guardians and Wards Generally." This Court has previously recognized that these

> The circuit court or family court of the county in which the minor resides, or if the minor is a nonresident of the state, the county in which the minor has an estate, may appoint as the minor's guardian a suitable person. The father or mother shall receive priority. However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian.

Id. at § 44-10-3(a). Thus, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 provides courts with authority to appoint a "suitable person" as a minor's guardian. Id. As this Court has previously acknowledged, however, "[t]he statute does not describe the types of situations in which such appointments are appropriate . . . ." Richard P., 227 W. Va. at ___, 708 S.E.2d at 485.

sections of the Code apply to situations involving custodial guardianship appointments for minor children. See, e.g., Abigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. at 473 n.11, 665 S.E.2d at 307 n.11 ("The statutory provisions relating to guardians and wards generally, W. Va. Code § 44–10–1, et seq., have frequently been relied upon by this Court when making custodial determinations."). Moreover, the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Minor Guardianship Proceedings specifically provide that these Code sections apply to guardianships of either "the person or estate of a minor, or both." Id. at Rule 2(a).

Although these statutes have long been utilized by the courts of this State to appoint guardians for minors in custodial matters, it is clear that these statutes were originally drafted, more than one hundred years ago, with an eye towards the administration of trusts and estates. The statutes simply do not adequately address guardianship issues in modern-day, custodial matters. This Court has previously recognized these inadequacies and urged the Legislature to address these statutes. See In re Richard P., 227 W. Va. 285, ___, 708 S.E.2d 479, 488 (2010) (Davis, C.J., concurring) ("I feel compelled to write separately to reiterate my concerns regarding the inadequacy of the guardianship statutes currently in place that fail to consider the unique circumstances of modern-day families . . . ."). Having had to apply these statutes yet again in a matter that they are not fully adequate to address, we again urge the Legislature to examine the need for a statutory framework for resolving guardianship issues relating to custody, as opposed to guardianships in the context of fiduciary responsibilities to minors.

West Virginia Code § 44-10-4, entitled "Right of minor to nominate guardian," provides:

> (a) If the minor is above the age of fourteen years, he or she may in the presence of the circuit or family court, or in writing acknowledged before any officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of a deed, nominate his or her own guardian, who, if approved by the court, shall be appointed accordingly.
>
> (b) If the guardian nominated by the minor is not appointed by the court, or if the minor resides outside the state, or if, after being summoned, the minor neglects to nominate a suitable person, the court may appoint the guardian in the same manner as if the minor were under the age of fourteen years.

Id. (emphasis added). This statute, therefore, extends to children fourteen years or older the right to nominate their own guardians. Like West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, however, nothing in this statute describes the circumstances under which such a nomination may be made.

The petitioners argue that under the plain language of these statutes and the cases interpreting them, Antonio is entitled to nominate Carol G. as his guardian and this Court must accept such nomination. In support of this position, the petitioners rely on several cases which have interpreted West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 as requiring a court to appoint a guardian who has been nominated by a minor above the age of fourteen unless the court finds the proposed guardian to be "unfit."

In syllabus point seven of Garska v. McCoy, 167 W. Va. 59, 278 S.E.2d 357 (1981), a case involving a custody dispute between two biological parents, this Court interpreted West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 as giving a minor over the age of fourteen "an absolute right" to nominate his or her own guardian. The Court in Garska, however, was merely considering the language contained in West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 in order to determine the meaning of the phrase "a child of tender years," a concept sometimes considered in making custody determinations for young children. Id. To that end, the Court stated that "[t]he concept of a 'child of tender years' is somewhat elastic; obviously an infant in the suckling stage is of tender years, while an adolescent fourteen years of age or older is not, as he has an absolute right under W. Va. Code, 44-10-4 (1923) to nominate his own guardian. . . ." Id. at Syl. Pt. 7, in part.

A year after Garska was issued, the Court clarified that while a child over the age of fourteen may have an absolute right to nominate his or her own guardian, a court is not bound to appoint such guardian. S. H. v. R. L. H., 169 W. Va. 550, 289 S.E.2d 186 (1982). Notably, in S.H., the Court considered the language of this statute in the context of a custody dispute between two biological parents, rather than a biological parent and a third party. The Court explained that

> [t]he use of the word "nominate" in Code, 44-10-4 [1923] means that unless the court finds the nominee unfit to serve as guardian, the nominee should be confirmed by the court. . . . Certainly the court is not required to confirm a child's > nomination of an "unfit" parent as his guardian, and when a child nominates an unfit parent as his guardian it is the obligation of the court to award the custody to the other parent.

169 W. Va. at 555, 289 S.E.2d at 189-90 (emphasis added). It therefore held that > [t]he word "nominate" as used in syl. pt. 7 of Garska v. McCoy, ___ W. Va. ___, 278 S.E.2d 357 (1981) means that a child has a right to suggest a guardian to the court, and that the court is obliged to confirm the nomination of that particular guardian unless the court specifically finds such guardian to be unfit to serve in such capacity under the general rules governing unfitness outlined in Garska v. McCoy, supra.

Id. at Syl. Pt. 2.

The petitioners in the instant case have understandably seized upon the language in Garska and S. H. to argue that the Court is obligated to appoint Carol G. as Antonio's guardian, given that Antonio is above the age of fourteen and there is no evidence that Carol G. would be an "unfit" guardian. Having closely considered this issue, however, the Court finds that the petitioners' interpretation of West Virginia Code § 44-10-4, and their reliance on S. H., is misguided.

This Court has long recognized that statutes that relate to the same subject matter must be read in consideration of one another.

> Statutes which relate to the same persons or things, or to the same class of persons or things, or statutes which have a common purpose will be regarded in pari materia to assure recognition and implementation of the legislative intent.

> Accordingly, a court should not limit its consideration to any single part, provision, section, sentence, phrase or word, but rather review the act or statute in its entirety to ascertain legislative intent properly.

Syl. Pt. 5, Fruehauf Corp. v. Huntington Moving & Storage Co., 159 W. Va. 14, 217 S.E.2d 907 (1975). Here, West Virginia Code §§ 44-10-3 and -4 are statutes which clearly relate to the same subject matter, i.e., the appointment of guardians for minor children. Thus, the two statutes must "be regarded in pari materia to assure recognition and implementation of the legislative intent." Fruehauf Corp., 159 W. Va. 14, 217 S.E.2d 907, Syl. Pt. 5.

West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 grants authority to family and circuit courts to appoint guardians for minors and gives courts discretion in determining when such appointments are necessary and who to appoint as a guardian in an individual case. The plain language of the statute provides that a "circuit court or family court . . . may appoint as the minor's guardian a suitable person." Id. at § 44-10-3(a) (emphasis added). We reiterated the discretionary nature of the language of this statute in Abbigail Faye B., holding:

> Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 44–10–3(a) (2006) (Supp. 2007), the circuit court or family court of the county in which a minor resides may appoint a suitable person to serve as the minor's guardian. In appointing a guardian, the court shall give priority to the minor's mother or father. "However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian." W. Va. Code § 44–10–3(a).

Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300, Syl. Pt. 6. More specifically, this Court has explained that, under well-settled principles of statutory construction, "[b]y stating that family and circuit courts may, rather than must, appoint a suitable person as a guardian for a minor, the Legislature granted family and circuit courts discretion in determining when the appointment of a guardian is appropriate." Richard P., 227 W. Va. at ___, 708 S.E.2d at 486.

West Virginia Code § 44-10-4, on the other hand, merely clarifies that, when the minor for whom a guardian is to be appointed is above the age of fourteen, such minor is entitled to have a say in who the court appoints. See S.H., 169 W. Va. 550, 289 S.E.2d 186, Syl. Pt. 2. This statute does not independently authorize courts to appoint guardians for minors, nor does it alter the discretion afforded to courts in West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 to determine when a guardianship appointment for a minor is appropriate. Rather, West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 simply reduces a court's discretion in choosing the person to appoint as guardian when the minor is above the age of fourteen. The statute does not, as the petitioners contend, require courts to appoint any guardian nominated by a minor above the age of fourteen if such guardian is found to be "fit."

Thus, the Court now holds that a family or circuit court's authority to appoint a suitable person as a guardian for a minor, including a minor above the age of fourteen, is derived from West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 (2010), which grants courts discretion in determining when the appointment of a guardian for a minor is appropriate. West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 (2010), which entitles a minor above the age of fourteen to nominate his or her own guardian, applies only after a court has determined, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, that a particular circumstance warrants the appointment of a guardian. Accordingly, the circuit court properly concluded that it was not obligated under West Virginia Code § 44-10-4 to appoint Carol G. as Antonio's guardian, despite his age and Carol G.'s fitness.

B. Parent's Constitutional Rights to Custody of Children

Because family and circuit courts have discretion in determining whether to appoint a guardian for a minor, we must next consider whether the lower courts abused their discretion in denying the guardianship petition in this case. Specifically, the circuit court affirmed the family court's refusal to appoint Carol G. as Antonio's guardian, finding that "there is no basis in law for a child, of any age, to take away his or her own fit parent's right to custody and nominate a third-party guardian. . . ."

A biological parent's right to the custody of his or her child is rooted in the due process clauses of both the West Virginia and the United States' Constitutions:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected > and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).[4] Of course, a biological parent's constitutional right to the custody of his or her child is not unfettered. This Court has held that, in any case involving child custody, "[t]he controlling principle . . . is the welfare of the child and . . . in a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404, 405, 168 S.E.2d 798, 799 (1969). To this end, we have held that a parent's natural right to the custody of his or her child is limited in cases in which the parent is found to be abusive, neglectful or otherwise unfit:

> A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.

Syllabus, Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960).

Admittedly, striking a balance between a biological parent's constitutional rights and the child's best interests can be difficult. This Court specifically considered this

---

[4]Although this Court has historically used the term "natural parent" when referring to a "biological parent," the terms are interchangeable in their legal meaning and the term "biological" more accurately describes the status of a parent who has contributed biologically to the conception and delivery of a child.

delicate balance in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989). In that case, a non-offending, "fit," biological father sought custody of his daughter. Id. at 450, 388 S.E.2d at 323-24. From an early age, the child had lived with her biological mother, step-father and half-sibling. Id. at 450, 388 S.E.2d at 323. Following the mother's tragic death, and pursuant to the mother's last will and testament, the child's step-father was appointed as her guardian. Id. at 450, 388 S.E.2d at 323-24. The biological father filed a petition arguing that "an unoffending natural parent should be entitled to custody of his or her child if such parent has not abandoned such child nor has in any manner been proven unfit." Id. at 450, 388 S.E.2d at 324. The circuit court agreed, granting custody to the biological father, despite the step-father's contention that the child's best interests would be served by allowing the child to continue to live with him and the child's half-sibling. Id. at 450-51, 388 S.E.2d at 324.

On appeal, this Court recognized that the child's best interest "is of immeasurable importance," but further acknowledged the right of a biological parent to raise his or her own child. Id. at 451, 388 S.E.2d at 324. It stated that > [a]lthough the polar star concept is adhered to by this Court in child custody cases, we have "refused to apply it in cases where the parents have not abandoned the child or have in no manner been proved to be unfit to have the care and custody of such child." Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 347, 211 S.E.2d 118, 121 (1975). This concept "will not be invoked to deprive an unoffending parent of his natural right to the custody of his child." Hammack, 158 W. Va. at 347, 211 S.E.2d at 121.

Id. Moreover, the Court recognized that " 'a strong presumption' " exists that " 'the welfare of the child is well protected when he is in the custody of an unoffending natural parent.' " Id. at 451, 388 S.E.2d at 324-25 (quoting Hammack, 158 W. Va. at 347, 211 S.E.2d at 121). Accordingly, the Court in Honaker affirmed the lower court's decision to return custody to the biological father, utilizing a lengthy transitional period.

In the instant case, Gina H. argues that, because the allegations of abuse and neglect were found to be unsubstantiated, she too is a non-offending, fit, biological parent, who has a constitutional right to the custody of her minor child. The petitioners, on the other hand, contend that the circuit court erred by focusing solely on Gina H.'s constitutional rights, without giving due consideration to Antonio's best interests. They argue that not only is the best interest analysis the polar star of all child custody proceedings, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 specifically requires consideration of the child's best interests in guardianship cases.

In 2008, this Court squarely addressed the tension between a child's best interests and a biological parent's right to the custody of his or her child in the context of a guardianship petition filed by a third party. Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300. In that case, an infant, Abbigail, was born to a teenage mother, Autumn, who was still residing with her parents. Id. at 470, 665 S.E.2d at 304. The grandparents contributed significantly to Abbigail's care from her birth until her mother moved out, approximately six months later. Id. at 470-71, 665 S.E.2d at 304-05. When Autumn decided to move out and take Abbigail with her, the grandparents filed a petition for guardianship, alleging that Autumn had abandoned Abbigail at various times and that she was not properly caring for Abbigail's special needs. Id. at 471, 665 S.E.2d at 305.

Following an investigation, Child Protective Services determined that Abbigail was not an abused or neglected child and that Autumn had not abandoned her. Id. at 472, 665 S.E.2d at 306. The circuit court conducted a hearing on the petition for guardianship and concluded that the grandparents had failed to prove that abuse or neglect had occurred or that Autumn was not a "fit" parent. Id. Thus, the circuit court denied the grandparent's petition for guardianship and returned custody of Abbigail to Autumn. Id.

On appeal, this Court found that West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 "permits a court to appoint a guardian for a minor child if the proposed guardian is competent and fit, but requires the court to accord priority to the child's mother or father." 222 W. Va. at 477, 665 S.E.2d at 311. The Court then noted that "[d]ivesting a child's biological parent of his/her guardianship, or custody, is a very serious matter. This Court repeatedly has recognized the inherent rights parents have to the custody of their own children, and any party seeking to interfere with such rights must bear a heavy burden." Id. at 478, 665 S.E.2d at 312 (footnote omitted).

After reviewing and affirming the circuit court's findings that Abbigail had not been abused or neglected and that Autumn was a fit parent, this Court turned to the issue of the child's best interests. Id. at 478-79, 665 S.E.2d at 312-13. The Court explained that " '[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . in all family law matters . . . must be the health and welfare of the children.' " Id. at 480, 665 S.E.2d at 314 (quoting Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)). The Court found, however, that "we typically have been reluctant to change a child's custodial placement unless such a change will materially promote the child's best interests." 222 W. Va. at 480, 665 S.E.2d at 314. In considering the facts of the case before it, the Court recognized that the grandparents could provide a "fine home" for Abbigail, and that they had been very involved in her care. Id. at 481, 665 S.E.2d at 315. Nevertheless, " '[w]hile courts always look to the best interests of the child in controversies concerning his or her custody, such custody should not be denied to a parent merely because some other person might possibly furnish the child a better home or better care.' " Id. at Syl. Pt. 12 (quoting Syl. pt. 3, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975)) (emphasis added). Thus, the Court concluded that:

> we agree with the circuit court's assessment that Abbigail's best interests require her to be placed with her parents, Autumn and > Josh. Although Abbigail has bonded significantly with [the grandparents], she should also be afforded the opportunity to bond with her biological parents, Autumn and Josh. Simply because [the grandparents] have been in a position to provide substantial care for Abbigail, at times to the exclusion of Autumn and Josh, does not presumptively make them a better placement for Abbigail. . . . Absent evidence that Abbigail's safety would be endangered by awarding her guardianship to her parents, we cannot find any justification in the record to indicate that her welfare and best interests would not be served by placing her with her parents, Autumn and Josh, particularly in light of our prior findings that they are fit and competent to serve as her guardians and have, thus, been accorded a statutory preference pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44–10–3(a).

222 W. Va. at 481, 665 S.E.2d at 315.

As the circuit court noted, the facts of the instant case are very similar to those of Abbigail Faye B. and many of the same legal principles apply. A court may not divest Gina H., Antonio's biological mother, of her custodial rights simply because Carol G. would be a "fit" guardian. Undoubtedly, Carol G. has played a very important role in Antonio's life, but the fact that she "might possibly furnish the child a better home or better care," is not sufficient to divest Gina H. of her rights as Antonio's biological parent. See id. at Syl. Pt. 12. Moreover, because Antonio had been living with Gina H. for the three years prior to the filing of the guardianship petition, the lower courts were properly reluctant to change Antonio's custodial placement. See id. at 480, 665 S.E.2d at 314. Accordingly, the circuit court correctly concluded that Gina H.'s constitutional rights as Antonio's biological mother would be violated by appointing a third party as Antonio's guardian.

C. Psychological Parent Analysis

The petitioners do not dispute that Gina H. has certain rights as a biological parent. Nevertheless, they contend that the lower courts erred by failing to consider Carol G.'s role as Antonio's psychological parent.

> A psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In re Brandon L.E., 183 W. Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990), that case is expressly modified.

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005). This Court has previously held that "[i]n exceptional cases and subject to the court's discretion, a psychological parent may intervene in a custody proceeding brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-103 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) when such intervention is likely to serve the best interests of the child(ren) whose custody is under adjudication." Id. at Syl. Pt. 4.

Here, the petitioners contend that Carol G. is Antonio's psychological parent, as she is the person he lived with for over ten years of his life and is the person he would choose to live with now. Relying on a recent Memorandum Decision issued by this Court in In the Interest of Robert H., Slip. Op. 101469 (W. Va. filed April 1, 2011), the petitioners contend that, as Antonio's psychological parent, Carol G. should be appointed as his guardian.

In Robert H., a biological father appealed a circuit court's order granting guardianship of his son to the child's maternal great-aunt and great-uncle. Id. at 1. The child, Robert H., first went to live with his great-aunt and great-uncle after his mother lost custody due to drug problems. Id. Although his father, the petitioner, was granted custody at that time, the father made an arrangement with the great-aunt and great-uncle to care for Robert H., as the father was frequently away for long periods of time as a result of his employment as a long-haul truck driver. Id. After several years of this living arrangement, the great-aunt and great-uncle filed a petition for guardianship alleging that they were Robert H.'s psychological parents. Id. at 2. While the circuit court found the petitioner had not abandoned Robert H. or otherwise engaged in abuse or neglect, it found that Robert H. had bonded with the great-aunt and great-uncle, that he was thriving in their care, and that they were his psychological parents. Id. Thus, the circuit court appointed the great-aunt and great-uncle as Robert H.'s permanent guardians. Id.

On appeal, the father argued that, as the child's biological parent who has not been found to be abusive or neglectful, he is entitled to the custody of Robert H. Id. This Court, however, upheld the circuit court's ruling, finding that the father had "voluntarily transferred custody" of Robert H. to the great-aunt and great-uncle, thereby relinquishing his natural right to the custody of his child under Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691, Syllabus ("A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent . . . has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts."). Slip. Op. 101469 at 3. After concluding that the great-aunt and great-uncle were, in fact, the child's psychological parents, the Court affirmed the appointment of the great-aunt and great-uncle as Robert H.'s guardians, noting that such arrangement was in the child's best interests. Id.

The petitioners in the instant case argue that, like the great-aunt and great-uncle in Robert H., Carol G. should be appointed as Antonio's guardian. Unlike the child in Robert H., however, Antonio had been living with his mother, Gina H., for the three years preceding the filing of the guardianship petition. While Carol G. might have been able to succeed under this theory during the approximately ten years that Antonio lived with her, at this point in time, this Court cannot find that Gina H. has voluntarily transferred or relinquished custody of Antonio.

Nevertheless, the Court is sympathetic to Antonio's desire to have a continued relationship with his grandmother, who appears to have been his psychological parent for many years. While the lower courts did not err in denying Carol G.'s petition for guardianship, Antonio may be entitled to visitation with her. As previously discussed, this Court ruled in Honaker v. Burnside that the biological father of the child at issue was entitled to custody. 182 W. Va. at 451, 388 S.E.2d at 325. It further held, however, that the best interests of the child may, in certain cases, necessitate visitation with other parties: "[a]lthough custody of minor child should be with the natural parent absent proof of abandonment or some form of misconduct or neglect, the child may have a right to continued visitation rights with the stepparent or half-sibling." Id. at Syl. Pt. 2. Likewise, Antonio has a right to continued visitation with his grandmother, Carol G., who appears to have served as his psychological parent for much of his life. Moreover, Article 10 of Chapter 48 of the West Virginia Code sets forth specific procedures governing court ordered visitation for grandparents and grandchildren. Consequently, although Gina H. has properly been awarded custody of Antonio, several other legal avenues exist by which Carol G. may seek to protect her relationship with her grandson. The family court should schedule a hearing as soon as possible to establish a schedule for visitation between Antonio and Carol G.

As a final matter, representations made by the parties during oral argument indicate that Gina H. continues to have a strained relationship with her son, Antonio. Consequently, if given the opportunity, the family court should consider ordering further counseling for Antonio and Gina H. to aid them in establishing a better parent-child relationship.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth herein, the lower courts did not abuse their discretion in denying Carol G.'s petition for guardianship; accordingly, the Court affirms the July 8, 2010, final order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County, West Virginia.

Affirmed with directions.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Benjamin, J., concurring:

I concur in the result of the majority opinion affirming the denial of the infant guardianship requested by Antonio R.A.'s grandparent. As the majority opinion duly explains, this was an appeal of the denial of an infant guardianship proceeding by the grandparent. This was not a petition for grandparent visitation. This Court affirmed these denials, but placed in its opinion certain directives requiring implementation of grandparent visitation by the family court. The majority opinion references the statutory procedure for the grandmother to request grandparent visitation with Antonio R.A., but circumvents that procedure by directing that "[t]he family should schedule a hearing as soon as possible to establish a schedule for visitation between Antonio and Carol G."

I am concerned that the granting of grandparent visitation by this Court without the procedural safeguards inherent in our statutory and case law is supplanting the important role of the family court in determining whether visitation is in the child's best interests. Therefore, while I agree with the affirmation of the lower court's denial of the guardianship, I disagree that this Court can order visitation without the benefit of a petition by the grandmother seeking this visitation and without adhering to the statutory guidelines for establishment thereof.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through W.Va.Code § 49-6-10 (1996) that prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Per curiam:

The petitioner, Michelle M.,[1] appeals the March 31, 2011, order of the Circuit Court of Webster County terminating her parental rights. The appeal is premised on the arguments of the petitioner that the prosecuting attorney failed to recommend only the termination of the petitioner's custodial rights as recommended by the respondent, Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR), and that the circuit court was in error in terminating her parental rights instead of just her custodial rights. After a thorough review of the record presented for consideration, the briefs, the legal authorities cited, and the arguments of the petitioners and the respondent, we find that the circuit court erred in terminating Michelle M.'s parental rights by failing to comply with the procedural requirements of Rule 34 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and by failing to acquire and consider the wishes of the child, Ashton M., as to the termination of Michelle M.'s parental rights as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2011). We therefore reverse the circuit court's termination of Michelle M.'s parental rights and remand to the circuit court so that it may allow DHHR to revise its case plan and hold a new hearing in compliance with Rule 34. In the event that the revised plan recommends termination of Michelle M.'s parental rights, the court should determine and consider Ashton M.'s wishes in reaching a decision as to Michelle M.'s parental rights as required by W. Va.

[1]We follow our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters, as well as other cases involving sensitive facts by abbreviating the last names of the parties. See, e.g., In re Jessica G., 226 W. Va. 17, 697 S.E.2d 53 (2010).

Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2011).

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

On January 19, 2011, DHHR filed a petition alleging the abuse and neglect of Ashton M., a sixteen-year-old minor, by her mother, Michelle M., and her mother's live-in boyfriend, Terry H. Through the petition, DHHR requested that the Circuit Court of Webster County enter an emergency protective order granting DHHR custody of Ashton M. In support of its petition, DHHR included findings it gathered from interviews with Ashton M., Michelle M., and Terry H.

According to the petition, Ashton M. claimed that beginning in 2003 or 2004 when she was eight or nine years old and continuing until the filing of the petition, Terry H. engaged in contact such as touching her breasts and vagina, fondling her, and watching her shower. She stated that she informed her mother of these alleged abuses.

As noted in its petition, DHHR's interview with Michelle M. revealed the following:

> i. Michelle [M.] stated that she had once given Terry [H.] permission to examine the child's breasts, when she had complained about them being sore, because she did not > know what to look for and that she believed Terry did know from having previously examined his teenage daughters' breasts.

>
> ii. Michelle [M.] reported that the child had never stated anything to her about being "fingered" and that she did not believe the child when she reported being watched in the shower.[2]
> iii. Michelle [M.] reported that she once allowed Terry [H.] to examine the child's vaginal area when the child reported having an unknown discharge.

Also noted in the petition, DHHR's interview with Terry H. shows that he admitted to examining Ashton M.'s breasts on one occasion and also to "maybe once stating that he would give her a cell phone if she would show him her breasts."

After a preliminary hearing on February 2, 2011, the circuit court entered an order on February 3, 2011, placing Ashton M. into the custody of DHHR. In the order, the circuit court found that the statements of Michelle M. and Terry H. confirmed that the alleged abuses occurred and that Michelle M. failed to protect Ashton M. from abuse.

An adjudicatory hearing was held on February 18, 2011, at which time the circuit court took judicial notice of the evidence previously adduced at the preliminary hearing, and the court heard testimony. The circuit court found that Michelle M. and Terry H. were abusive and neglectful parents and that Ashton M. was an abused and neglected child under the meaning of the law.

At the dispositional hearing on March 11, 2011, the circuit court terminated Michelle M.'s parental rights, despite the recommendation of DHHR, given through the testimony of DHHR caseworker Sheila Ware[3] and DHHR's case plan for the child, that only Michelle M.'s custodial rights be terminated. During the hearing, the court discussed the termination of parental rights with the prosecuting attorney, Dwayne Vandevender, and Michelle M.'s attorney, Howard Blyler:

> MR. VANDEVENDER: Your Honor, as far as the Adult Repondents, Mr. [H.] and Ms. [M.], they don't want custody. Ms. [M.'s] testimony is that she doesn't believe what happened. She still lives with Mr. [H.] and she states that her actions will continue to not protect Ashton, Your Honor. So we believe that the termination recommended by the Department is --
> THE COURT: Well, let me ask you; in light of the overwhelming evidence in this case and in light of the absolute refusal of the mother to acknowledge the truth of that, and based on the desires of the infant to maintain a relationship, why should I not permanently terminate parental rights based on the Supreme Court's decision. I mean, why should I not permanently terminate?

[3]The petitioner correctly states in her brief that the transcript of the dispositional hearing incorrectly refers to Sheila Ware as "Sheila Winter."

> MR. VANDEVENDER: Your Honor, I see no reason why you shouldn't. Post-termination visitation I believe should be at Ashton's discretion. She wants visitation. After the last hearing she asked if she could see her mother supervised for a few minutes and so I believe she wants that. And I believe that the Court should allow it as per the previous court order. But I see no reason why you shouldn't terminate.
>
>
> MR. BLYLER: . . . [F]or the Department's Attorney to now stand up and take a position contrary to what we had been advised puts me in a difficult position because we haven't presented any witnesses and haven't gotten into that. We relied on that. The Guardian ad Litem has relied on that.
>
> THE COURT: They first made the recommendation only after I made inquiry based on the case law in this state did the Prosecutor state that he didn't know of any reason why I shouldn't under case law.

At the dispositional hearing, the parties also discussed Ashton M.'s feelings toward her mother and her wishes going forward. In regard to Ashton M.'s wishes as to the termination of her mother's parental rights, the judge stated, "I just don't know what the desires of the child are."

The court entered its order with its findings from the dispositional hearing on March 31, 2012. The order terminated Michelle M.'s parental rights. Michelle M. now appeals this order.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The petitioner requests that this Court reverse the circuit court's order terminating her parental rights. In abuse and neglect proceedings, questions of fact are reviewed for clear error, and questions of law are reviewed de novo:

> "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety. Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)."

Syl. pt. 1, In re Jessica G., 226 W. Va. 17, 697 S.E.2d 53 (2010).

III.

DISCUSSION

Michelle M. asserts two assignments of error. First, she argues that the prosecuting attorney inappropriately failed to recommend termination of her custodial rights, rather than her parental rights, contrary to the recommendation of DHHR. Second, she argues that the circuit court improperly terminated her parental rights instead of only her custodial rights. As to this second assignment of error, Michelle M. alleges that the circuit court failed to comply with both the W. Va. Code and the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. We now address each of her arguments in turn.

A.

Prosecutorial Duty

Whether the prosecuting attorney acted appropriately in this case requires an evaluation of prosecutorial duties in abuse and neglect cases. We have established that "'[a] prosecuting attorney is a constitutional officer who exercises the sovereign power of the State at the will of the people and he is at all times answerable to them. W.Va. Const., art. 2, Sec. 2; art. 3, Sec. 2; art. 9, Sec. 1.' Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Preissler v. Dostert, 163 W.Va. 719, 260 S.E.2d 279 (1979)." Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997). This Court has addressed the role of the prosecuting attorney in abuse and neglect cases in syllabus point 4 of State ex rel. Diva P.:

> In civil abuse and neglect cases, the legislature has made DHHR the State's representative. In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through W.Va.Code § 49-6-10 (1996) that prosecutors must > cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Therefore, all of the legal and ethical principles that govern the attorney-client relationship in general, are applicable to the relationship that exists between DHHR and county prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

(Emphasis in original).

In the case before us now, Michelle M. argues in her brief to this Court that "the Prosecuting Attorney who is charged with representing the best interest of the Department in this case failed to appropriately make the recommendations that his client set forth on the stand in his argument to the Court." She also states,

> I cannot imagine a private attorney representing a private individual in a civil or criminal matter or even an attorney representing a Respondent in an abuse and neglect petition standing up and saying to the court that it doesn't matter what my client wishes the Court to do and make a recommendation contrary to the best interest of his client.

We agree with Michelle M. that an attorney-client relationship existed between the prosecuting attorney and DHHR, and as such, the prosecuting attorney had a duty to represent DHHR's recommendation of termination of custodial rights only, not termination of parental rights, to the circuit court. However, after reviewing the transcript of the dispositional hearing, we disagree with Michelle M.'s conclusion that the prosecuting attorney failed to meet his obligations.

During the dispositional hearing, the prosecuting attorney presented evidence through the testimony of the DHHR caseworker that DHHR recommended termination of Michelle M.'s custodial rights. At no point in the hearing did the prosecuting attorney recommend to the circuit court that it terminate Michelle M.'s parental rights. We believe Michelle M. mischaracterizes the statements of the prosecuting attorney in his responses to the circuit court's questions regarding termination of parental rights. Rather, the circuit court attempted to clarify the prosecuting attorney's responses by stating that the prosecuting attorney recognized that the circuit court had the legal authority to terminate parental rights despite DHHR's recommendation that only Michelle M.'s custodial rights be terminated.

We also note that in DHHR's original petition to the circuit court to remove Ashton M. from the custody of Michelle M. and Terry H. and place her in DHHR's custody, DHHR included the following: "The [DHHR] would further pray that in the event the Court deems it appropriate, the Court order the termination of the parental or custodial rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parents and commit said infant to the permanent custody of the [DHHR] . . . ." (Emphasis added). At no point after filing this petition did DHHR seek to clarify that it no longer sought the termination of parental rights. Therefore, even if the prosecuting attorney had actively recommended that the circuit court terminate parental rights instead of custodial rights, he still would not have been violating his duty to his client. Therefore, we find that the prosecuting attorney did not act inappropriately during the dispositional hearing.

B.

Rejection of the Case Plan

Michelle M. alleges that the circuit court's dispositional hearing order terminating her parental rights must be reversed because it does not comply with Rule 34 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. Rule 34 states,

> If objections to the child's case plan are raised at the disposition hearing, the court shall enter an order:
> (a) Approving the plan;
> (b) Ordering compliance with all or part of the plan;
> (c) Modifying the plan in accordance with the evidence presented at the hearing; or > (d) Rejecting the plan and ordering [DHHR] to submit a revised plan within thirty (30) days. If the court rejects the child's case plan, the court shall schedule another disposition hearing within forty-five (45) days.[4]

Michelle M. relies on subsection (d) to support the proposition that, upon the circuit court's objection to the child's case plan recommending the termination of custodial rights, the circuit court should have scheduled another dispositional hearing and ordered DHHR to create a revised plan.

[4]The "case plan" described in this rule is formed by combining the "family case plan" as described in W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3 (1998) with additional information required by and described in § 49-6-5(a) (2011).

None of the parties cites to case law to support or refute Michelle M.'s application of this rule. We have only discussed Rule 34 in one case: In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001). In that case, DHHR submitted a case plan recommending that the mother receive an improvement period with the ultimate goal of reunification of the children with the mother. The circuit court did not agree that the mother should receive an improvement period and entered an order terminating her parental rights to one of her children. This Court found that "[t]he lower court, through its disposition order, implicitly rejected the case and permanency plan submitted by the DHHR."

Like In re Edward B., the circuit court in the case at bar did not follow the DHHR case plan recommendation and terminated the parental rights of the petitioner. In doing so, the circuit court implicitly rejected that case plan. Therefore, as Michelle M. argues, under Rule 34(d), the circuit court should have scheduled a subsequent dispositional hearing and should have ordered that DHHR create a revised case plan.

During oral argument, Michelle M. argued that W. Va. Code § 49-5D-3a(a) (2004) should also apply in this case, but that there appears to be a conflict between Rule 34 and this statute. Michelle M. referred to § 49-5D-3a to support her proposition that the circuit court acted prematurely in terminating her parental rights. Section 49-5D-3a(a) reads,

> In any case in which a multidisciplinary treatment team develops an individualized service plan for a child pursuant to the provisions of section three of this article, the court shall review the proposed service plan to determine if implementation of the plan is in the child's best interests. If the multidisciplinary team cannot agree on a plan or if the court determines not to adopt the team's recommendations, it shall, upon motion or sua sponte, schedule and hold within ten days of such determination, and prior to the entry of an order placing the child in the custody of the department or in an out-of-home setting, a hearing to consider evidence from the team as to its rationale for the proposed service plan. If, after hearing held pursuant to the provisions of this section, the court does not adopt the teams's recommended service plan, it shall make specific written findings as to why the team's recommended service plan was not adopted.

Specifically, Michelle M. contends that § 49-5D-3a(a) required the circuit court to schedule a hearing to reevaluate the case after a ten-day period. Michelle M. noted that this ten-day requirement appears to conflict with the forty-five day requirement of Rule 34.

The conflict Michelle M. believes exists is easily resolved. Section 49-5D-3a(a) and Rule 34 do not refer to the same thing; Rule 34 refers to a case plan developed according to § 49-6-5(a). Section 49-5D-3a(a) refers to an individualized service plan created by a multidisciplinary team (MDT) according to § 49-5D-3 (2007).[5] In this case, the record shows that the MDT did make a recommendation as to Michelle M.'s rights, but the record does not show that a multidisciplinary team created an individualized service plan for Ashton M. Therefore, § 49-5D-3a(a) does not apply in this case.

Although § 49-5D-3a(a) does not apply, Rule 34 does apply to the instant case. DHHR created a case plan that was rejected by the circuit court, and DHHR was not given the opportunity to revise the case plan before the circuit court entered its order terminating Michelle M.'s parental rights. Under the de novo review of this legal issue, we find that the circuit court committed reversible error by failing to comply with Rule 34.

C.

Consideration of the Child's Wishes

In arguing that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights, Michelle M. also references W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(C) (2011), which requires the court to "give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights." In her brief to this Court, the Guardian ad Litem references In re Jessica

[5]Pursuant to § 49-5D-3(a), individualized service plans are only created "for children who are victims of abuse or neglect and their families when a judicial proceeding has been initiated involving the child or children for juveniles and their families involved in status offense or delinquency proceedings."

G., 226 W. Va. 17, 697 S.E.2d 53 (2010), to support the proposition that Ashton M.'s wishes regarding the termination of her mother's parental rights should have been considered before Michelle M.'s parental rights were terminated.

The pertinent facts of In re Jessica G. are similar to the those of the case at bar. In that case, the parent's parental rights were also terminated in an abuse and neglect proceeding. Unlike here, in In re Jessica G., the circuit court had been presented with evidence that the child, a thirteen-year-old, did not wish for her father's rights to be terminated. The Court found,

> After reviewing the circuit court's order terminating the Appellant's parental and custodial rights, as well as a review of the transcript of the dispositional hearing, we find that the circuit court failed to adequately explain why Jessica G.'s, who was thirteen years old at the time of the dispositional hearing (and is now fourteen years old), was not "otherwise of an age of discretion," Id., and why her wishes were not factored into whether termination of the Appellant's parental rights, and the concomitant bond between Jessica G. and her father, might be contrary to Jessica G.'s best interest and emotional well-being. We are particularly concerned with the complete absence of any testimony at the dispositional hearing by a licensed mental health care provider as to the possible psychological consequences to Jessica G. by terminating her father's parental rights.
> In Syllabus Point 5, In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001) we held that:
> > Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child > Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

In re Jessica G., 226 W. Va. 17, 22, 697 S.E.2d 53, 58 (2010).

The facts in the record demonstrate that the circuit court, in deciding to terminate Michelle M.'s parental rights, did not have before it Ashton M.'s wishes regarding the termination of her mother's parental rights when it made its decision. During the dispositional hearing, none of the parties expressed what Ashton M.'s wishes were in regard to the termination of Michelle M.'s parental rights. It appears from the record that the parties had only acquired Ashton M.'s wishes as to the termination of Michelle M.'s custodial rights and not the termination of Michelle M.'s parental rights. Also, the circuit court noted that it did not know what the desires of Ashton M. were. Finally, there is no discussion of the wishes of the child regarding the termination of Michelle M.'s parental rights in the circuit court's March 31, 2011, order.

Upon de novo review of the circuit court's March 31, 2011, order, we find that the circuit court failed to determine or consider Ashton M.'s wishes regarding the termination of her mother's parental rights as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6).

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, this Court reverses the circuit court's order entered March 31, 2011, which terminates the petitioner's parental rights. This case is remanded to the Circuit Court of Webster County so that it may comply with the requirements of Rule 34 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. In the event that DHHR's revised case plan recommends termination of parental rights, the circuit court shall determine and consider the wishes of Ashton M. pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(C).

Reversed and remanded with directions.

RORY L. PERRY II, CLERK
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Workman, Justice, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part:

I dissent to the majority's conclusion that the lower court failed to consider the wishes of the child, Ashton M., pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(C)(2009 & Supp. 2011)[1] regarding disposition, and to their finding that the circuit court did not comply with the requirements of Rule 34 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect. I concur with the majority regarding the determination "that the prosecuting attorney did not act inappropriately during the dispositional hearing[,]" when the prosecutor recognized that the circuit court had the legal authority to terminate the Petitioner mother's parental rights despite the DHHR's recommendation that only her custodial rights be terminated.

I.

The majority looks almost silly in reaching the conclusion that the circuit court failed to consider Ashton's wishes, because an examination of the record of the dispositional hearing makes it abundantly clear that the circuit court gave careful consideration to the child's wishes and fashioned a disposition that would protect her from further abuse, but still honored her wishes to have continued contact with her mother. At the dispositional hearing, the guardian ad litem argued to the circuit court that as long as Ashton could maintain contact and a relationship with her mother, she would be "happy" with the circuit court's decision. (Emphasis added). Specifically, after the circuit court brought up the possibility that it would terminate the Respondent mother's rights, the guardian ad litem argued as follows:

[1]West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(C) requires the court to "give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights." Id.

MS. MORTON: Your Honor, perhaps there's a distinction without a difference. Ashton does want to maintain a relationship and contact with her mother. The reason I did call her in here to discuss this matter of legal verus parental rights is that she is 16. What she wants to accomplish is the continued contact with her mother.

Now, the way I understood termination of custodial rights was that Michelle would be forever barred from having physical custody of Ashton. Now if her parental rights were terminated, parental legal rights were terminated, that would also bar any inheritance by Ashton from her mother or –

THE COURT: I don't know where that comes from. As a matter of fact, I don't know any case that addresses that issue. With regard to that, certainly the issue of support is not terminated by the termination of parental rights.

But again, my question is the Supreme Court has said that with a person of teenage years if it causes some emotional impact upon the child, that termination of parental rights, the Court should consider the wishes of the child in that regard.

Now that may be in some way the distinction without a difference, if I understand what you're saying; that I can terminate parental rights if it doesn't have any adverse impact upon the child but still meets the desires of the child by permitting post-termination visitation. Where I can designate that visitation is that when you look to the decision by the Supreme Court that indicates that in terms of the parental rights that have been terminated up to [sic] adoption, any party can file a motion for modification.

It clearly says in that case that if the parental rights have been terminated, then the parents don't have the right to do that. But if the parental rights have not been terminated then that would give the mother the right to come in and seek a modification prior to disposition subject to termination of parental rights. So I think there is a significant legal difference. I just don't know what the desires of the child are.

MS. MORTON: It would be significant for Ashton, not 18.

THE COURT: She's not 18, she's 16.

MS. MORTON: I mean she's 16, which means she's very close. If she were a child of 2 or 6 – Your Honor, she's out in the hall and I could bring her in. It's just very difficult for her to come into these proceedings. It's hard. What I'm saying to you is this; I don't know that she would understand the legal distinction that the Court just made and obviously I didn't understand it all either because I misspoke. However, as long as the maintenance of contact and visitation continues with her mother, however that is accomplished, is intact I think the child will be happy.

* * *

MS. MORTON: Like I said, I think so long as that means is accomplished and maintained I think she's going to be happy. As far as the child is concerned it's the end that is important, not the means or way which we get there.

* * *

THE COURT: The Court finds that the Respondent Mother has failed to adequately protect the child; that she failed to take reasonable action to protect the child in light of clear and convincing evidence to the contrary. The Court is further of the opinion that she desires to maintain contact and a relationship with Mr. H[][.] [the Respondent's boyfriend] over maintaining custodial rights of the child.

The Court finds there is no reasonable grounds to believe that the conditions of the abuse and neglect that have arisen can be reasonably corrected within the foreseeable future. There is absolutely no evidence before this Court that the termination of the Respondent Mother's parental rights will adversely affect the child. In fact, the desires of the child set forth in the record in this case indicates that the child's interests can be adequately protected by the Court granting the Respondent Mother supervised post-termination visitation with the child in accordance with the child's desires.

Therefore, the parental rights of the Respondent Mother are hereby permanently terminated and the Court will grant supervised post-termination visitation with the child to be supervised by the grandmother at a reasonable time provided the child will never be out of the presence of the grandmother with the mother and pursuant to the desires of the infant child.

(Emphasis added).

Obviously, neither the Petitioner mother's counsel nor the guardian ad litem seemed to understand that even when parental rights are terminated, visitation and contact can continue. This Court first enunciated the concept of post-termination visitation in In re Christina L, 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). The circuit court understood the law and fashioned thereunder a means to protect Ashton from further abuse while still permitting her continued contact with her mother in a safe setting and even made specific findings regarding the child's wishes as can be seen from this portion of the transcript in which the circuit court states:

> Therefore, the parental rights of the Respondent Mother are hereby permanently terminated and the Court will grant supervised post-termination visitation with the child to be supervised by the grandmother at a reasonable time provided the child will never be out of the presence of the grandmother with the mother and pursuant to the desires of the infant child.

(Emphasis added). And although the guardian ad litem did not know the correct terminology, she stated the child's wishes very clearly on the record, and the judge not only considered, but also honored them.

Exacerbating the problem with the majority turning a part of its decision on this issue is that neither the Petitioner mother nor the guardian ad litem even assigned as error the circuit court's alleged failure to consider the wishes of the child, but merely argued it within the context of the assignment of error relating to termination. Consequently, the majority has elevated an argument to "assignment of error" status. This Court has consistently found that assignments of error nor raised on appeal are deemed waived. See Covington v. Smith, 213 W. Va. 309, 317 n.8, 582 S.E.2d 756, 764 n.8 (2003) (stating that casual mention of an issue in a brief is insufficient to preserve the issue on appeal); Tiernan v. Charleston Area Med. Ctr., Inc., 203 W. Va. 135, 140 n.10, 506 S.E.2d 578, 583 n.10 (1998) (finding that "[i]ssues not raised on appeal or merely mentioned in passing are deemed waived." (citation omitted)); State v. Lilly, 194 W.Va. 595, 605 n.16, 461 S.E.2d 101, 111 n.16 (1995) (finding that "'casual mention of an issue in a brief is cursory treatment insufficient to preserve the issue on appeal.'" (internal quotations and citation omitted)). Nor did the guardian ad litem and mother state an objection for the record on this issue. Consequently, the majority takes an alleged error that was not preserved by any party before the circuit court or made the subject of an assignment of error here and reverses the circuit court on that basis.

Moreover, nothing in In re Jessica G., 226 W. Va. 17, 697 S.E.2d 53 (2010), or in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)((6), which is relied upon by the majority in reversing the circuit court on this issue, can be construed "to imply that the wishes of a child who is fourteen years or older, or who is an age of discretion as determined by the court, must control a court's decision on whether to terminate parental rights." In re Jessica G., 226 W. Va. at 23, 697 S.E.2d at 59 (Workman, J., concurring). Again, West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) only provides that "[n]otwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights." Id. Thus, the child's only right emanating from the foregoing statute is to express his or her wishes regarding the termination of the parental rights. "The ultimate decision [concerning termination of parental rights] remains squarely within the circuit court's discretion; however, the best interests of the child remains the paramount consideration." 226 W. Va. at 23, 697 S.E.2d at 59. In the instant case, it is clear from the hearing below that the guardian ad litem expressed Ashton's desires to maintain a relationship with her mother, and that so long as permitted to do so, that was all that mattered to Ashton. The circuit court considered this desire in granting supervised post-termination visitation.

II.

Rule 34 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides:

> If objections to the child's case plan are raised at the disposition hearing, the court shall enter an order:
>
> (a) Approving the plan;
>
> (b) Ordering compliance with all or part of the plan;
>
> (c) Modifying the plan in accordance with the evidence presented at the hearing; or
> (d) Rejecting the plan and ordering the Department to submit a revised plan within thirty (30) days. If the court rejects the child's case plan, the court shall schedule another disposition hearing within forty-five (45) days.

Id. That rule was examined in In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001), wherein the Court held in syllabus point five that

> [w]here it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

Id. at 624, 558 S.E.2d at 623 (emphasis added).

The only difference in the DHHR's recommendation and the circuit court's disposition is one of semantics. Thus, the circuit court Order did not substantially disregard or frustrate the disposition process recommendation as required by In re Edward B. Id. Instead, after hearing argument of counsel (and providing an opportunity for evidence to be taken if any party desired to do so), the circuit court modified the plan in accordance with the hearing. Id.

Upon remand, the circuit court will surely once again hear the child's wishes and act as is his prerogative as the presiding circuit court judge in terminating rights and allowing post-termination visitation. This result is not only reasonable, compassionate and legally sound, it also protects this child from further abuse. It should be noted that the Petitioner mother continued to maintain her boyfriend's innocence of sexual abuse of her child, even in light of his own admissions to sexual abuse. A mother's choice of a boyfriend over her child in this type of scenario clearly reflects a lack of basic maternal instinct and ability to protect. Absent termination of legal rights, this mother could return to court and seek to regain full legal rights to this child. The circuit court wanted to see to it that the child's wishes were honored, but also wanted to protect her from further abuse.

Perhaps the majority will yawn, and say, oh well, this is just a per curiam opinion and this child will be eighteen soon anyway. But it must be remembered that the law set forth by the majority will have precedential value[2] and may be cited as legal support in future cases where there is not the potentially imminent protection of a child reaching age eighteen.

[2]See Syl. Pts. 3 and 4 of Walker v. Doe, 210 W. Va. 490, 558 S.E.290 (2002)(holding that "[p]er curiam opinion have precedential value as an application of settled principles of law to facts necessarily differing from those at issue in signed opinions. The value of a per curiam opinion arises in part from the guidance such decisions can provide to the lower courts regarding the proper application of the syllabus points of law relied upon to reach decisions in those cases[,]" and "[a] per curiam opinion may be cited as support for a legal argument.").

654 F. Supp. 2d 465

United States District Court,
N.D. West Virginia.
Stoney W. AULT, Petitioner,
v.
Teresa WAID, Warden, Respondent.

Civil Action No. 2:07cv88.
Sept. 16, 2009.

Stoney W. Ault, St. Mary's, WV, pro se.

Robert D. Goldberg, Attorney General's Office, Charleston, WV, for Respondent.

ORDER

ROBERT E. MAXWELL, District Judge.

It will be recalled that on April 8, 2009, Magistrate Judge Kaull filed his Report and Recommendation, wherein the Petitioner was directed, in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1), to file with the Clerk of Court any written objections within ten (10) days after being served with a copy of the Report and Recommendation. On June 8, 2009, the Court, after having granted the Petitioner an extension of time within which to file his objections, received Petitioner's objections.

Upon examination of the report from the Magistrate Judge, it appears to the Court that all matters raised and suggested by Magistrate Judge Kaull in his Report and Recommendation are appropriate. Upon examination of the report from the Magistrate Judge, it appears to the Court that the issues raised by the Petitioner in his Petition For Writ of Habeas Corpus, filed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2254, wherein Petitioner alleges several state trial court errors during the trial leading to his conviction, were thoroughly considered by Magistrate Judge Kaull in his Report and Recommendation, as were the Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment and the Petitioner's response thereto. Moreover, the Court, upon an independent de novo consideration of all matters now before it, is of the opinion that the Report and Recommendation accurately reflects the law applicable to the facts and circumstances before the Court in this action. Furthermore, upon consideration of the Petitioner's objections, it appears to the Court that the Petitioner has not raised any issues that were not thoroughly considered and accurately addressed by Magistrate Judge Kaull in his Report and Recommendation. Therefore, it is ORDERED that Magistrate Judge Kaull's Report and Recommendation be, and the same hereby is, accepted in whole and that this civil action be disposed of in accordance with the recommendation of the Magistrate Judge. Accordingly, it is hereby

ORDERED that Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment (docket # 25) be, and the same hereby is, GRANTED. It is further ORDERED that Stoney Ault's Petition in this matter be, and the same hereby is, DENIED, DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE and STRICKEN from the docket of this Court. It is further ORDERED that the Clerk shall enter judgment for the Respondent. It is further ORDERED that, if Petitioner should desire to appeal the decision of this Court, written notice of appeal must be received by the Clerk of this Court within thirty (30) days from the date of the entry of the Judgment Order, pursuant to Rule 4, Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. The $5.00 filing fee for the notice of appeal and the $450.00 docketing fee should also be submitted with the notice of appeal. In the alternative, at the time the notice of appeal is submitted, Petitioner may, in accordance with the provisions of Rule 24(a), Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, seek leave to proceed in forma pauperis from the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

OPINION/REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION

JOHN S. KAULL, United States Magistrate Judge.

This § 2254 was transferred from the Southern District of West Virginia on October 30, 2007. It was received by this Court on November 1, 2007.

On December 21, 2007, the respondent was directed to file a response to the petition on the limited issue of timeliness. The respondent filed her answer on January 17, 2008.

Because the respondent provided sufficient evidence to verify the timeliness of the petition, on August 25, 2008, the respondent was directed to show cause why the petition should not be granted.

On September 9, 2008, the petitioner was granted permission to supplement his petition. As a result, the respondent was given additional time to review the supplement and file a response.

The respondent filed a Motion for Summary Judgment and Memorandum in Support on November 5, 2008. Because the petitioner is proceeding pro se, the Court issued a Roseboro Notice on November 7, 2008, advising the petitioner of his right to file responsive material.

The petitioner filed his response on December 8, 2008.

I. Procedural History

A. Petitioner's Conviction and Sentence

On November 14, 2000, the petitioner was indicted by the Circuit Court of Grant County, West Virginia, of three counts Sexual Assault in the First Degree in violation of W.Va.Code § 61-8B-3, and two counts of Sexual Abuse by a Parent, Guardian or Custodian in violation of W.Va.Code § 61-8D-5(a). Resp't Ex. 1.

The case against the petitioner proceeded to trial on June 3, 2002. Resp't. Ex. 8. On June 4, 2002, a Grant County petit jury found the petitioner guilty of First Degree Sexual Abuse (a lesser included offense of Count One) and guilty of count four, Sexual Abuse by a Custodian. Id. at 346. The petitioner was acquitted on counts two, three and five. Resp't Ex. 2.[FN1]

On October 8, 2002, the petitioner was sentenced to one to five years imprisonment on Count One, and ten to twenty years on Count 4, sentences to run concurrent. Resp't Ex. 3.

B. Direct Appeal

On April 21, 2003, the petitioner appealed his conviction and sentence to the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals ("WVSCA"). Resp't Ex. 4. On appeal, the petitioner asserted the following assignments of error:

(1) the trial court misapplied the Rape Shield Law, W.Va.Code § 61-8b-11(b);

(2) the trial court erred in allowing the child victim to testify using two-way television in a manner that did not adhere to the State statutory provisions for such testimony;

(3) the conviction cannot stand as the child victim's uncorroborated testimony is inherently incredible;

(4) the trial court erred in denying the defendant's Rule 29 motion;

(5) The trial court erred in failing to give a jury instruction proffered by the defendant; and

(6) the trial court erred by giving a lesser included offense instruction for First Degree Sexual Assault.

Id.

Petitioners' direct appeal was refused on October 2, 2003. Id.

C. Petitioner's State Habeas Petition

The petitioner filed a pro se state habeas petition with the Circuit Court of Grant County on June 17, 2005. Resp. Ex. 5. In his state habeas petition, the petitioner asserted the following grounds for relief:

(1) the trial court misapplied the Rape Shield Law to exclude evidence of the victim's previous sexual experience;

(2) the trial court erred by not following the statutory procedures for using closed-circuit television testimony;

(3) the trial court erred in admitting the victim's uncorroborated testimony because it was inherently unreliable;

(4) the trial court erred by denying the petitioner's Rule 29 motion for acquittal;

(5) the trial court erred by failing to give the jury a Payne instruction;

(6) the trial court erred by instructing the jury on sexual abuse, a lesser included offense of sexual assault, and allowing the jury to convict him of the lesser offense;

(7) he was denied his constitutional right to a speedy trial;

(8) he was denied a fair trial due to prosecutorial misconduct;

(9) the trial court erred by having improper communications with the jury;

(10) he was denied counsel at his preliminary hearing;

(11) the trial court violated his constitutional right against double jeopardy;

(12) the trial court erred by being influenced by judicial bias during his sentencing and by allowing impermissible considerations to be included in his presentence report;

(13) the trial court erred by failing to require the State to prove that he was custodian for the purpose of the crime of sexual abuse by a custodian;

(14) the trial court erred by allowing a biased juror to remain on the jury;

(15) the trial court erred in allowing the jury to consider improper information about his criminal record;

(16) he was denied his constitutional right to freedom of speech because his girlfriend was not allowed to park in the Court parking lot;

(17) he was denied his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel; and

(18) even if none of the above errors alone suffices to overturn his conviction, the cumulative error from the trial does.

Resp't Ex. 5; Ex. 6 at 161-162.

The state court held an omnibus evidentiary hearing on August 3, 2006. Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 (dckt. 38) at 158. In a ninety-one page order entered on August 10, 2006, the state court denied the petitioner's state habeas petition. Id. at 246. The petitioner filed an appeal of that decision to the WVSCA on February 26, 2007. Resp't Ex. 7. The WVSCA refused the petitioner's appeal on September 11, 2007. Id.

D. Petitioner's Federal Habeas Petition

In his federal habeas petition, the petitioner asserts the following grounds for relief:

(1) the trial court erred by giving an instruction on sexual abuse, a lesser included offense, when the victim's testimony did not support anything other than the greater offense of sexual assault, which offense the petitioner denied committing;

(2) he was denied his constitutional right to effective assistance of trial counsel;

(3) the trial court denied him due process of law by allowing his prior criminal record to be viewed by the jury;

(4) the trial court abused its discretion by blindly and mechanically applying the Rape Shield Law;

(5) the trial court erred in allowing the child victim to testify using two-way television in the manner done;

(6) the victim's testimony was uncorroborated and inherently incredible;

(7) the trial court erred in denying his Rule 29 motion for judgment of acquittal;

(8) the trial court erred in failing to give a jury instruction proffered by the defendant;

(9) the trial court erred by giving the lesser included offense instruction for First Degree Sexual Assault; and

(10) the appellate court should have applied the cumulative error doctrine.

On September 4, 2008, the petitioner raised the following supplemental grounds for relief:

(11) plain error; faulty, illegal and amended indictment to convict; and

(12) ineffective assistance of appellate counsel.

E. Respondents' Contentions

The respondent denies that any violation of the petitioner's rights has occurred. Moreover, in support of her motion for summary judgment, the respondent asserts that there are no genuine issues of material fact with respect to the claims raised in the petition and that she is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. In addition, the respondent asserts that federal relief is available only for claims of constitutional dimension. Therefore, to the extent that the petitioner's claims allege violations of state law, the respondent argues that those claims are not cognizable on federal habeas review. Finally, the respondent asserts that the petitioner has failed to state a claim for which relief can be granted and that the petitioner is not entitled to relief on any of his claim.

F. The Petitioner's Reply

In his reply, the petitioner reargues the claims raised in the petition in an attempt to rebut the arguments made by the respondent in her motion.

II. Standards of Review

A. Summary Judgment

The Supreme Court has recognized the appropriateness of Rule 56 summary judgment motions in habeas cases. See Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63, 80, 97 S.Ct. 1621, 52 L.Ed.2d 136 (1977). So too has the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. Maynard v. Dixon, 943 F.2d 407 (4th Cir.1991). Pursuant to Rule 56(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, summary judgment is appropriate "if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law."

Motions for summary judgment impose a difficult standard on the moving party; for it must be obvious that no rational trier of fact could find for the nonmoving party. Miller v. Federal Deposit Ins. Corp., 906 F.2d 972, 974 (4th Cir.1990). However, the "mere existence of a scintilla of evidence" favoring the nonmoving party will not prevent the entry of summary judgment. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 252, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202 (1986). To withstand such a motion, the nonmoving party must offer evidence from which a "fair-minded jury could return a verdict for the [party]." Id. "If the evidence is merely colorable, or is not significantly probative, summary judgment may be granted." Felty v. Graves-Humphreys Co., 818 F.2d 1126, 1128 (4th Cir.1987). Such evidence must consist of facts which are material, meaning that the facts might affect the outcome of the suit under applicable law, as well as genuine, meaning that they create fair doubt rather then encourage mere speculation. Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248, 106 S.Ct. 2505. It is well recognized that any permissible inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion. Matsushita Elec. Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587-588, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538 (1986).

B. Federal Habeas Review Under 28 U.S.C. § 2254

Notwithstanding the standards which govern the granting of a motion for summary judgment, the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 2254 must be examined to determine whether habeas relief is proper. Title 28 U.S.C. § 2254 requires a district court to entertain a petition for habeas corpus relief from a prisoner in State custody, but "only on the ground that he is in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States." 28 U.S.C. § 2254(a). Regardless, "[a]n application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted unless it appears that ... the applicant has exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State." 28 U.S.C. § 2254(b)(1)(A). However, the federal court may not grant habeas relief unless the state court's adjudication of the claim:

> (1) resulted in a decision that was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States; or
> (2) resulted in a decision that was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State Court proceeding.

28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1) and (2); see also Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 120 S.Ct. 1495, 146 L.Ed.2d 389 (2000).

[1] The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals has determined that "the phrase 'adjudication on the merits' in section 2254(d) excludes only claims that were not raised in state court, and not claims that were decided in state court, albeit in a summary fashion." Thomas v. Taylor, 170 F.3d 466, 475 (4th Cir.1999). When a state court summarily rejects a claim and does not set forth its reasoning, the federal court independently reviews the record and clearly established Supreme Court law. Bell v. Jarvis, 236 F.3d 149 (4th Cir.2000) cert. denied, 534 U.S. 830, 122 S.Ct. 74, 151 L.Ed.2d 39 (2001) (quoting Bacon v. Lee, 225 F.3d 470, 478 (4th Cir.2000)). However, the court must still "confine [it's] review to whether the court's determination 'resulted in a decision that was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.' " Id. at 158.

A federal habeas court may grant relief under the "contrary to" clause "if the state court arrives at a conclusion opposite to that reached by this Court on a question of law or if the state court decides a case differently that this Court has on a set of materially indistinguishable facts." Williams, 529 U.S. at 413, 120 S.Ct. 1495. A federal court may grant a habeas writ under the "unreasonable application" clause, "if the state court identifies the correct governing legal principle from the Court's decisions but unreasonably applies that principle to the facts of the prisoner's case." Id. "An unreasonable application of federal law is different from an incorrect application of federal law." Id. at 410, 120 S.Ct. 1495.

When a petitioner challenges the factual determination made by a state court, "federal habeas relief is available only if the state court's decision to deny post-conviction relief was 'based on an unreasonable determination of the facts.' " 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(2). In reviewing a state court's ruling on post-conviction relief, "we are mindful that 'a determination on a factual issue made by a State court shall be presumed correct,' and the burden is on the petitioner to rebut this presumption 'by clear and convincing evidence.' " Tucker v. Ozmint, 350 F.3d 433, 439 (4th Cir.2003).

However, habeas corpus relief is not warranted unless the constitutional trial error had a "substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict." Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 637, 113 S.Ct. 1710, 123 L.Ed.2d 353 (1993); Richmond v. Polk, 375 F.3d 309 (4th Cir.2004). "Under this standard, habeas petitioners may obtain plenary review of their constitutional claims, but they are not entitled to habeas relief based on trial error unless they can establish that it resulted in 'actual prejudice.' " Brecht, supra.

Here, the petitioner's claims were properly presented to the courts of the State. Because the petitioner's claims were adjudicated on the merits in State court, the State's findings of fact and conclusions of law are due the appropriate deference.

III. Analysis

[2][3] Although pro se petitions are to be liberally construed as set forth in Haines v. Kerner, 404 U.S. 519, 92 S.Ct. 594, 30 L.Ed.2d 652 (1972), habeas petitions must meet heightened pleading requirements. McFarland v. Scott, 512 U.S. 849, 114 S.Ct. 2568, 129 L.Ed.2d 666 (1994). "[N]otice pleading is not sufficient, for the petition is expected to state facts that point to a real possibility of constitutional error." Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63, 75, n. 7, 97 S.Ct. 1621, 52 L.Ed.2d 136 (1977) (internal quotations omitted). A habeas petitioner must come forth with evidence that a claim has merit. Nickerson v. Lee, 971 F.2d 1125, 1136 (4th Cir.1992), cert. denied, 507 U.S. 923, 113 S.Ct. 1289, 122 L.Ed.2d 681 (1993). Unsupported, conclusory allegations do not entitle a habeas petitioner to relief. Id.

A. Ground One-Giving of Instruction on Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Abuse

[4] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the trial court erred by giving an instruction on sexual abuse, a lesser included offense of sexual assault, when the victim's testimony did not support anything other than the greater offense of sexual assault and the petitioner denied committing the alleged offenses. In support of this claim, the petitioner asserts that the victim's testimony clearly met the requirements of the greater offense of sexual assault in that she testified to both intrusion and intercourse. The petitioner alleges that no where in the victim's testimony did she allege the elements of sexual abuse. Moreover, the petitioner asserts that he denied all of the accusations against him and that there was no evidentiary conflict which supported giving an instruction on the lesser included offense. The petitioner asserts that although the State requested the charge, it was not entitled to such charge, especially in light of the defendant's objection. Additionally, the petitioner asserts that the trial court failed to apply the appropriate standard for determining whether the charge was warranted.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to prove that the trial court's inclusion in its jury instruction and on the verdict form of sexual abuse, a lesser included offense of sexual assault as charged in the indictment, denied the Petitioner his right to a fair trial or his right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusations against him ...

> To prove sexual assault in the first degree, the State must show that a defendant, at least fourteen years old, engaged in sexual intercourse or sexual intrusion with a child under the age of twelve. W.Va.Code § 61-8B-3. The statute defines sexual intercourse as any act between persons involving penetration, however slight, of the female sex organ by the male sex organ, or involving contact between sex organs of one person and the mouth or anus of another person. Id. The statute defines sexual intrusion as any act between persons involving penetration, however slight, of the female sex organ, or of the anus of any person, by an object, for the purpose of degrading or humiliating the person so penetrated or for gratifying the sexual desires of either party. Id.
>
> To prove sexual abuse in the first degree, the State must show that a defendant, at least fourteen years old, subjected a child under the age of twelve to sexual contact. W.Va.Code § 61-8B-7. The statute defines sexual contact as any intentional touching, either directly or through clothing, of the anus or any part of the sex organs of a person, or the breasts of a female, or the intentional touching of any part of another person's body by the actor's sex organs, where the victim is not married to the actor and the touching is done for the purposes of gratifying the sexual desire of either party. Id.
> Both first degree sexual assault and first degree sexual abuse require that a defendant, at least fourteen years old, engage in a sexual act with the victim under the age of twelve. First degree sexual assault requires that the sexual act be sexual intercourse or sexual intrusion. First degree sexual abuse requires only that the sexual act be sexual contact. To prove penetration as required for first degree sexual assault, the perpetrator must necessarily make sexual contact with the victim. Therefore, all of the requirements for first degree sexual abuse must be shown to commit the offense of first degree sexual assault. First degree sexual assault, however, requires the additional element of penetration. Consequently, first degree sexual abuse constitutes a lesser included offense of first degree sexual assault.

The petitioner knew that the victim had accused him of committing sexual acts against her. He had the statement she gave to the police and Lynn Foley prior to the trial. In her statement, the victim accuses the Petitioner of both penetration and mere sexual contact. [State v. Ault, No. 00-F-22 p. 66, Transcript of Interview Taken August 4, 2001]. Therefore, the Petitioner knew the nature of the accusations against him.

As stated above, the Court may instruct the jury that if they do not find a defendant guilty of the charge for which he was indicted, the jury may, nevertheless, find the defendant guilty of a lesser included charge. In this case, the Court correctly instructed the jury of the requirement for sexual assault in the first degree and its lesser included charge of sexual abuse in the first degree. The jury found sufficient evidence to convict the Petitioner of sexual abuse in the first degree. The Court did not violate the Petitioner's right to a fair trial or his right to know the nature of the accusations against him by instructing the jury on the lesser included charge of sexual abuse in the first degree and allowing the jury to convict the Petitioner of the same.

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 (Order Denying State Habeas Petition) at 189-92.

Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground one was not contrary to clearly established federal law as neither the petitioner, the respondent, nor the undersigned, can find a Supreme Court case which forbids a trial court from giving a lesser included offense instruction if the charge is supported by the evidence.

[5] Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground one involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings. As noted by the state habeas court “[t]he test for determining whether a particular offense is a lesser included offense is that the lesser included offense must be such that it is impossible to commit the greater offense without first having committed the lesser offense. An offense is not a lesser included offense if it requires the inclusion of an element not required in the greater offense." Resp't Ex. 6 at 190 (citing Syl. Pt. 4, State v. Bell, 211 W.Va. 308, 565 S.E.2d 430 (2002)). Moreover, based on the statutory definitions of sexual assault in the first degree, and first degree sexual abuse, it is clear that one cannot commit first degree sexual assault without first committing first degree sexual abuse. The petitioner's argument that the two are separate and distinct charges because Sexual Assault in the First Degree requires an element (penetration) not found in First Degree Sexual Abuse, is off the mark. Sexual Assault in the First Degree is the greater offense. The test for determining whether a charge is a lesser included offense is whether the lesser offense contains an element which is not required in the greater offense.

Accordingly, the undersigned recommends that ground one be denied.

B. Ground Two-Ineffective Assistance of Trial Counsel

In this ground, the petitioner asserts three incidents of ineffective assistance of trial counsel. First, the petitioner asserts that trial counsel was ineffective for agreeing to allow the child victim's Guardian at Litem ("GAL") to be present in the testimony room with the victim during her closed-circuit television testimony. Second, the petitioner asserts that counsel was ineffective for failing to strike a juror for cause, or to use a peremptory strike, on a juror who knew the victim and one of the prosecution's witnesses. Third, the petitioner asserts that counsel was ineffective for allowing a copy of his prior criminal record to be admitted to the jury for their consideration.

1. Allowing GAL in Testimony Room with Victim

In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that pursuant to W.Va.Code § 62-6b-4(b)(1), the only persons permitted to be in the testimony room for closed-circuit television testimony, are the prosecuting attorney, the defendant's attorney, the witness and the equipment operator. Thus, the petitioner asserts that his rights were violated when the GAL was allowed in the testimony room with the victim, and counsel was ineffective for agreeing to such an arrangement. In particular, the petitioner notes that the GAL patted the victim reassuringly during her testimony and verbally coached the victim by telling her she was doing a good job, and by telling her to "tell them what you remember." The petitioner asserts that the presence of the GAL tainted and influenced the victim's testimony, thus, her presence in the testimony room was highly prejudicial and should have been prevented.

2. Failing to Strike Juror who Knew Victim and One of Prosecution's Witnesses

In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that trial counsel failed to properly voir dire Juror Martin. The petitioner asserts that during voir dire, Juror Martin revealed that she knew the victim in this case and one of the prosecution's witnesses. Juror Martin informed the court that she had been the victim's 4-H leader for a period of two months, about two months prior to the trial, and that her children attended the same school as the victim. In addition, Juror Martin informed the Court that she also knew one of the prosecution's witnesses through the 4-H. Further, the petitioner asserts that although Juror Martin stated that she did not know either the victim or the other witness very well, she also did not unequivocally state that she could render an impartial verdict. In fact, the petitioner asserts that Juror Martin stated that she did not know if she could be impartial.

3. Allowing Jury to See Copy of Petitioner's Prior Criminal Record

In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that evidence of his prior criminal record was inadvertently given to the jury. Moreover, the jury clearly considered that evidence because it specifically asked the Court what "CDW" meant.[FN2] When the jury requested information on what CDW stood for, counsel for the petitioner was concerned that the jury would think that CDW involved children and would be highly prejudicial to the petitioner. Counsel for the petitioner requested that the Court explain to the jury that his CDW arrest had nothing to do with children. That motion was denied.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to prove his trial counsel was ineffective in violation of his right to counsel as guaranteed by the U.S. Const. Amend. VI and the WV Const. Art. III § 14.
> * * *

Washington,* 466 U.S. 668, 104 S.Ct. 2052, 80 L.E.2d [L.Ed.2d] 674 (1984): (1) counsel's performance was deficient under an objective standard of reasonableness; and (2) there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceedings would have been different.' Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Frye, [221 W.Va. 154], 650 S.E.2d 574, 2006 WL 386363 (WVSC Feb. 17, 2006).

Thus, a reviewing court asks whether a reasonable lawyer would have acted, under the circumstances, as defense counsel acted in the case at issue.' Syl. Pt. 2, Id. ...
>
> 'The strong presumption that counsel's actions were the result of sound trial strategy ... can be rebutted only by clear record evidence that the strategy adopted by counsel was unreasonable.' Coleman, 215 W.Va. at 596 [600 S.E.2d 304], supra p. 23.

>
> 1. The Petitioner argues that his counsel acted ineffectively when they failed to strike a potentially bias juror from his jury panel. [Ault v. Haines: No. 05-C-39, Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus p. 5(a)].
>
> The Petitioner asserts that Juror Martin, who testified during voir dire that she led a 4-H club which the victim had briefly attended, prejudiced the entire jury against him. [Id.] The Petitioner claims that his counsel should have moved to strike this juror for cause based on her association with the victim and her foster family. [Id.].

As discussed in ground fourteen, supra, the Court determined that Juror Martin sufficiently indicated that she would decide the case only on the evidence provided at trial and the instructions given by the Court. The juror said she would not be influenced by her very brief acquaintance with the victim. Therefore, even had defense counsel moved to strike her for cause, the Court likely would have properly denied their request.

Defense counsel could have used one of the Petitioner's strikes to remove the juror from the jury if the Petitioner worried that she would prejudice the jury against him. The court assumes, and the Petitioner has provided no evidence to the contrary, that defense counsel and the Petitioner discussed whom to strike from the jury and determined that Juror Martin need not be stricken. Therefore, defense counsel did not act ineffectively by failing to strike Juror Martin from the jury.

12. The Petitioner asserts that his counsel acted ineffectively by introducing into evidence the case submission report which contained the Petitioner's criminal history and which was sent back to the jury room and seen by the jury during deliberations. [Ault v. Haines, No. 04-C-2, Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus p. 11].

As discussed in ground fifteen, supra, the Court agrees that the Petitioner's criminal history should not have been introduced into evidence in any manner. Defense counsel did err in neglecting to remove the Petitioner's criminal history from the forensic case submission report. However, as the Court has already discussed, any error caused by the introduction of the Petitioner's criminal history was cured by the Court's curative instruction. The Court is not convinced that the outcome of the trial would have been any different if this error had not occurred. Therefore, the Petitioner is not entitled to habeas corpus relief based on this ground alone.

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 225-26, 228-29, 238 (emphasis in original).

Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground two was not contrary to clearly established federal law. The state court cited the appropriate standard of review, Strickland v. Washington, supra. Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground two involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings.

Failure to Strike Juror Martin

[6] Although Juror Martin was acquainted with the child victim and one of the prosecution's witnesses, she did not have a close relationship with either party. Moreover, Juror Martin stated, although not unequivocally, that she did not think that her acquaintance with those parties would influence her decision in this case. In fact, it is quite clear that the jury, as a whole, took its role as the trier of fact very seriously. The jury deliberated for a long time, at one point questioning the Court on the procedure for a hung jury. In addition, the jury acquitted the defendant of the majority of the charges and only found him guilty on ground one as to the lesser included offense. Thus, assuming that defense counsel should have requested to strike Juror Martin, the petitioner has not shown that such motion would have been granted, nor that any prejudice occurred as a result of Juror Martin's presence on the jury.

Allowing the Jury to see Criminal Record

[7][8] The undersigned agrees that in this case, the Petitioner's criminal history should not have been introduced into evidence and that defense counsel erred by neglecting to remove said criminal history from the forensic case submission report. However, the undersigned also agrees that this error was harmless. When it was discovered that the petitioner's criminal history was inadvertently left on the forensic case submission report and that the jury had noticed it, the Court gave the jury an instruction to disregard that history as irrelevant and not to consider it in their deliberations. The jury is presumed to do as instructed. Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200, 208, 107 S.Ct. 1702, 95 L.Ed.2d 176 (1987) (requiring an overwhelming probability to rebut the presumption that a jury will follow the court's instruction to disregard irrelevant evidence). Moreover, the jury did not question the petitioner's criminal history further. Thus, the undersigned does not believe that but for counsel's error, the outcome of the proceedings would have been different.

Allowing GAL in Testimony Room

[9] The issue of counsel's ineffective with regard to the GAL was not raised in the petitioner's state habeas petition. However, the Court did address whether allowing the GAL in the testimony room with the child victim was appropriate. In so deciding, the state habeas court found:

> The Petitioner also agreed to allowing the GAL to be present in the room with the victim while she testified and stated that it might even be helpful. [Id. at p. 8 line 12-p. 9 line 22]. Even if the GAL's presence did reassure the victim, as the defense counsel pointed out, the GAL would have been able to be present in the courtroom if the victim had testified from the witness chair and the GAL would have had the same reassuring effect. [Id.].
> Resp't Ex. 6 at 176.

Thus, in essence, the state habeas court found that it was not error to allow the GAL in the testimony room, and even if it was, the petitioner was not prejudiced by that error. Therefore, if it was not error to allow the GAL in the testimony room, counsel's agreeing to such allowance was not deficient and his performance cannot be deemed ineffective. Alternately, even if counsel should have objected to the GAL being in the testimony room, the petitioner was not prejudiced by that error and counsel was not ineffective.

Although allowing the GAL in the testimony room with the victim was not the normal procedure under the statute, the undersigned is not convinced that it was error for defense counsel to agree to allow the GAL in the testimony room with the child victim. Moreover, the undersigned agrees with the state court that allowing the GAL in the testimony room was at best, harmless error. The petitioner provides no evidence, other than his own self-serving speculation, to show that the GAL's presence in the testimony room had any effect on the jury. In addition, the trial court explained the presence of the GAL to the jury which rendered her presence innocuous.[FN3]

Accordingly, ground two should be denied.

C. Ground Three-Allowing Prior Criminal Record to be Viewed by Jury

[10] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the trial court denied him due process of law by allowing his prior criminal record to be viewed by the jury. In support of this claim, the petitioner asserts that upon the motion of his trial counsel, the court admitted into evidence, a form which contained his prior criminal record. Specifically, the form noted that the petitioner had been arrested for disorderly conduct and CDW (carrying a dangerous weapon). The petitioner asserts that there was absolutely no reason for his prior criminal record to be submitted to the jury. Moreover, the petitioner asserts that the jury considered such record as evidenced by its question to the court asking what CDW meant. The petitioner asserts that because there is no way to know if his conviction was predicated in part on the jury's knowledge of his prior criminal record, his right to a fair trial was violated.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to prove that the trial court's curative instruction to the jury not to consider the Petitioner's criminal record insufficiently rectified the error at trial as to violate the Petitioner's right to a fair trial by due process of law as guaranteed by the U.S. Const. Amends. V and XIV and the WV Const. Art. III § 10.

determine if the error is harmless is: (1) the inadmissible evidence must be removed from the State's case and a determination made as to whether the remaining evidence is sufficient to convince impartial minds of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) if the remaining evidence is found to be insufficient, the error is not harmless; (3) if the remaining evidence is sufficient to support the conviction an analysis must then be made to determine whether the error had any prejudicial effect on the jury.' Syl. Pt. 3, Moss v. Trent, 216 W.Va. 192, 603 S.E.2d 656 (2004).

Neither the State nor the Court argue that the Petitioner's criminal history was properly left on the forensic case submission report. All participants in the Petitioner's case agree that the information about the Petitioner's prior crimes should have been removed from the exhibit before submitting it to the jury. However, as soon as the Court became aware of the mistake, the Court issued a curative instruction to the jury that the Petitioner's criminal history was irrelevant to this case and should not be considered in their deliberations. The Petitioner offers no evidence that the jury disregarded the Court's instruction and considered the impermissible evidence in its deliberations.

Furthermore, although defense counsel mistakenly introduced the improper evidence in this case, under the test set forth above for determining the effect of improper evidence submitted by the State, any error suffered by the Petitioner was harmless. Without the evidence of the Petitioner's criminal history, the State's case still consists of sufficient evidence to convict the Petitioner of the crimes charged. In fact, the Petitioner's criminal history, as the Court stated, is irrelevant to this case and does not change the evidence showing that the Petitioner sexually abused the victim. There is no evidence or indication that the Petitioner's criminal history influenced the jury in any way other than by sparking their curiosity as to the meaning of "C.D.W." Therefore, the Court did not err in upholding the Petitioner's convictions despite his criminal history's admission into evidence.

Moreover, the Petitioner failed to raise the inclusion of his criminal history as improper evidence as error in his appeal. Therefore, this ground should not be considered in a petition for writ of habeas corpus.

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 219-222.

Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground three was not contrary to clearly established federal law. See Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. at 637, 113 S.Ct. 1710 (an error is harmful only if it had a "substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict") (internal quotation omitted).

Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground three involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings. During deliberations, the jury sent a note to the judge asking what "CDW" meant. Resp't Ex. 8 (Trial Transcripts) at 323-34. After consulting with the prosecution and defense counsel, the trial judge drafted the following response: "To the jurors: You are not permitted to consider the Defendant's criminal history. That portion of the form should have been deleted. It is irrelevant to this case." Id. at 325. It is presumed, therefore, that the jury followed the court's instructions and disregarded the irrelevant evidence and the petitioner provides no evidence to overcome that presumption. See Richardson v. Marsh, supra. Consequently, any error in allowing the jury to view the petitioner's prior criminal history was harmless.

Accordingly, ground three should be denied.

D. Ground Four-Improper Application of West Virginia Rape Shield Law

[11] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the trial court improperly applied West Virginia's Rape Shield Law. In support of this claim, the petitioner asserts that the trial court blindly and mechanically applied the rape shield statute when it disallowed exculpatory and credibility evidence which would have contradicted the uncorroborated testimony of the child victim. Specifically, the petitioner asserts that the jury should have heard evidence of the victim's prior sexual abuse, her sexual acting out and the medical evaluation by Dr. Scarce, the doctor that examined the child victim when she was taken to the emergency room. The petitioner asserts that this evidence contradicted the victim's testimony that the petitioner sexually assaulted and abused her.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to prove that the trial court's application of the Rape Shield law to evidence of the victim's sexual history violated the Petitioner's right to due process of law as guaranteed by the U.S. Const. Amends. V and XIV and the WV Const. Article III § 10.
>
>
> 'Evidence of specific instances of the victim's sexual conduct with persons other than the defendant, opinion evidence of the victim's sexual conduct and reputation evidence of the victim's sexual conduct shall not be admissible ... [except] solely for the purpose of impeaching credibility, if the victim first makes his or her previous sexual conduct an issue in the trial introducing evidence with respect thereto.' W.Va.Code § 61-8B-11(b).
> 'The provisions of W.Va.Code, 61-8B-11, limiting the defendant's right to present evidence of the victim's prior sexual conduct are constitutional under the provisions of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution.' Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Guthrie, 205 W.Va. 326, 518 S.E.2d 83 (1999).

'The test used to determine whether a trial court's exclusion of proffered evidence under our rape shield law violated a defendant's due process right to a fair trial is (1) whether that testimony was relevant; (2) whether the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect; and (3) whether the State's compelling interests in excluding the evidence outweighed the defendant's right to present relevant evidence supportive of his or her defenses.' Syl. Pt. 6, Id.

'Statements about sexual activity involving an alleged victim which are not false are evidence of the alleged victim's sexual conduct, even though such conduct was involuntary-and such evidence is per se within the ordinary scope of rape shield laws.' State v. Quinn, 200 W.Va. 432, 437-438, 490 S.E.2d 34, 39-40 (1997) ...

The Petitioner argues that by refusing to allow evidence of the victim's previous sexual conduct, the Court allowed the jury to infer that the victim learned her precocious sexual knowledge from the Petitioner. He suggests that had the evidence been presented to the jury, the jury would have seen that the victim's previous sexual knowledge gave her the tools to fabricate the allegations against the Petitioner. [Id., Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus pp. 5(h)-5(i), filed 6/17/05]. At the omnibus hearing on August 3, 2006, the Petitioner further argued that he did not wish to introduce evidence of the victim's past sexual conduct to tarnish the child's reputation as is forbidden by the Rape Shield law. Rather, the Petitioner wanted to introduce the evidence to show that the victim had the knowledge to fabricate the allegations made against the Petitioner.

The evidence the Petitioner sought to introduce concerned the prior sexual conduct and sexual history of the victim. There was no indication, and the Petitioner did not argue, that the victim's previous allegations of sexual abuse were false. Therefore, evidence of the previous abuse is barred by the Rape Shield statute. Quinn, 200 W.Va. At 437-438, 490 S.E.2d at 39-40.

The evidence of the victim's prior sexual conduct, such as masturbation and attempts to insert objects into her vagina, is also barred by the Rape Shield statute. Not only are the acts irrelevant to the charges against the Petitioner, but they also would be highly prejudicial to the State and to the victim's testimony. The Court conducted a pretrial hearing and concluded the same:

> Upon consideration of the arguments made, the Court would now find as follows:
> 1. That the four areas listed by the Defendant in one of its Motions are acts of sexual conduct which are covered by the Rape Shield Statute.
> 2. The Defendant would not suffer any manifest injustice to his 6th Amendment Rights by denying the Defendant the opportunity to either cross examine witnesses or present independent witnesses with regard to the issues set forth in their Motion.

3. It would be more prejudicial to the victim and the State's interest than it would be probative to permit the Defendant to raise the various previous acts of sexual conduct of the alleged victim.

Therefore, the Court does grant the Guardian ad Litem's Motion in Limine. The Defendant will not be permitted to introduce any of said evidence or cross examine any witnesses with regard to same.

[State v. Ault, No. 00-F-22 at p. 270, Order entered 11/1/01].

Furthermore, the Petitioner's argument that the Court should have allowed him to introduce the victim's past sexual abuse to demonstrate her knowledge enabling her to fabricate the charges against him has no merit. W.Va.Code § 61-8B-11(b) clearly states that evidence prohibited by the Rape Shield statute can only be introduced to impeach the credibility of the victim. The statute does not provide an exception to the evidence's inadmissibility to show a victim's precocious sexual knowledge.

At trial, the State did not present any evidence of the victim's prior sexual conduct and therefore the excluded evidence could not be introduced to impeach the victim's credibility. Moreover, there is no discussion in the trial transcript about where the victim learned her sexual knowledge, and the phrases the victim used in describing the events were rudimentary and not indicative of abnormal sexual knowledge for a child that are. [Id., Testimony of [A.C.], transcribed by County Court Reporters, passim, filed 1/29/03]. And, despite the Court's ruling on the evidence's admissibility, the Petitioner's counsel did argue that the victim could have fabricated the charges against him. [Id., Trial Transcript, p. 313 lines 20-24, filed 1/13/03].

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 164-68.

[12] Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground four was not contrary to clearly established federal law. Absent "circumstances impugning fundamental fairness or infringing specific constitutional protections," admissibility of evidence does not present a federal question. Grundler v. North Carolina, 283 F.2d 798, 802 (4th Cir.1960). The Supreme Court has narrowly defined "the category of infractions that violate 'fundamental fairness.' " Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342, 352, 110 S.Ct. 668, 107 L.Ed.2d 708 (1990). With regard to the application of West Virginia's Rape Shield Law, the Fourth Circuit has found that a mechanistic exclusion of evidence under the statute may deny a defendant his right to confront and cross-examine his accuser. Barbe v. McBride, 521 F.3d 443, 458 (4th Cir.2008).

[13] "The trial court's consideration of the probative value versus the prejudicial effect of particular pieces of evidence, absent extraordinary circumstances, will not be disturbed." Beasley v. Holland, 649 F.Supp. 561, 565 (S.D.W.Va.1986) (citing United States v. MacDonald, 688 F.2d 224 (4th Cir.1982)). "[B]ecause a fundamental-fairness analysis is not subject to clearly definable legal elements, when engaged in such an endeavor a federal court must 'tread gingerly' and exercise 'considerable self-restraint.' " Duckett v. Mullin, 306 F.3d 982, 999 (10th Cir.2002)(quoting United States v. Rivera, 900 F.2d 1462, 1477 (10th Cir.1990)).

Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground four involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings. Prior to trial, the state court heard argument and examined the proposed evidence which involved sexual acts subject to the rape shield law. Resp't Ex. 10. With regard to this issue, the trial court found:

> The Defendant would not suffer any manifest injustice to his 6th Amendment Rights by denying the Defendant the opportunity to either cross-examine witnesses or present independent witnesses with regard to the issues set forth in the Motion ...
>
> It would be more prejudicial to the victim and the State's interest than it would be probative to permit the Defendant to raise the various previous acts of sexual conduct of the alleged victim.
> Resp't Ex. 10 at 3-4.

Thus, the trial court did not blindly and mechanistically apply West Virginia's Rape Shield Law in this case. Instead, the court appropriately balanced the interests of the parties and considered the probative versus prejudicial value of the evidence. To the extent that the petitioner argues that the decision of the trial court was wrong, the petitioner has failed to present extraordinary circumstances which would permit this court, on federal habeas review, to reweigh the evidence presented to the trial court and disturb the factual and evidentiary findings made by that court.

Accordingly, ground four should be denied.

E. Ground Five-Improperly Allowing Child Victim to Testify Using Two-Way Television

[14] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the trial court erred in allowing the child victim to testify using two-way television in the manner done. In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that the statute which allows testimony by closed-circuit television sets forth specific procedures to be followed in determining whether such testimony is necessary so that the defendant's constitutional rights are not trampled. The petitioner asserts that the trial court failed to follow the appropriate procedures and did not comply with the statute in finding that closed-circuit television was appropriate in this case. Thus, the petitioner asserts that his right to a fair and impartial trial was violated.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to prove that the trial court's allowance of the victim to testify via closed-circuit television violated his right to confront witnesses against him as guaranteed by the U.S. Const. Amend. VI and the WV Const. Art. III § 14.

* * *

'The Confrontation Clause reflects a preference for face-to-face confrontation at trial, a preference that must occasionally give way to considerations of public poverty and the necessities of the case.' Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 110 S.Ct. 3157, 3165 [111 L.Ed.2d 666] (1990).

'Use of the ... closed circuit television procedure, where necessary to further an important state interest, does not impinge upon the truth-seeking or symbolic purposes of the Confrontation Clause.' Id. at 852, [110 S.Ct. at] 3167.

'Accordingly, we hold that, if the State makes an adequate showing of necessity, the state interest in protecting the child witnesses from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of a special procedure that permits a child witness in such cases to testify at trial against a defendant in the absence of face-to-face confrontation with the defendant. Id. at 855, [110 S.Ct. at] 3169.

'The requisite finding of necessity must of course be a case-specific one: The trial court must hear evidence and determine whether use of the [ ] closed circuit television procedure is necessary to protect the welfare of the particular child witness who seeks to testify.' Id.

'The trial court must also find that the child witness would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally, but by the presence of the defendant ... the trial court must find that the emotional distress suffered by the child witness in the presence of the defendant is more than de minimus, i.e., more than 'mere nervousness or excitement or some reluctance to testify.' Id. at 856, [110 S.Ct. at] 3169.

'We conclude that where necessary to protect a child witness from trauma that would be caused by testifying in the physical presence of the defendant, at least where such trauma would impair the child's ability to communicate, the Confrontation Clause does not prohibit use of a procedure that, despite the absence of face-to-face confrontation, ensures the reliability of the evidence by subjecting it to rigorous adversarial testing and thereby preserves the essence of effective confrontation. Because there is no dispute that the child witnesses in this case testified under oath, were subject to full cross-examination, and were able to be observed by the judge, jury, and defendant as they testified, we conclude that, to the extent that a proper finding of necessity has been made, the admission of such testimony would be consonant with the Confrontation Clause.' Id. at 857, [110 S.Ct. at] 3170.

'Prior to ordering that the testimony of a child witness may be taken through the use of live, two-way closed circuit television, the circuit court must find by clear and convincing evidence, after conducting an evidentiary hearing on the issue, that:

1) The child is otherwise competent;

2) Absent the use of live, two-way closed-circuit television, the child witness will be unable to testify due solely to being required to be in the physical presence of the defendant while testifying;

3)The child witness can only testify if live, two-way closed-circuit television is used in the trial; and

4) The state's ability to proceed against the defendant without the child witness' live testimony would be substantially impaired or precluded.' W.Va.Code § 62-6B-3(b).

'In determining whether to allow a child witness to testify through live, two-way closed-circuit television the court shall appoint a psychiatrist, doctoral-level psychologist or a licensed clinical social worker with at least five years of significant clinical experience in the treatment and evaluation of children who shall serve as an advisor or friend of the court to provide the court with an expert opinion as to whether, to a reasonable degree of professional certainty, the child witness will suffer severe emotional harm, be unable to testify based solely on being in the physical presence of the defendant while testifying and that the child witness does not evidence signs of being subjected to undue influence or coercion.' W.Va.Code § 62-6B-3(d).

'When there has been a knowing and intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right, there is no error and the inquiry as to the effect of a deviation from the rule of law need not be determined.' State v. Johnson, 210 W.Va. 404, 411, 557 S.E.2d 811, 818 (2001) ...

The Petitioner argues that the Court violated his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation by not adhering to the statutory provisions for allowing a witness to testify by closed-circuit television. [Ault v. Haines, No. 05-C39, Supplemental Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus]. Specifically, the Petitioner contends that the Court failed to hold a hearing on allowing the victim to testify by closed-circuit television; that the Court took no evidence regarding the victim's ability to testify in court; and that the GAL was in the room with the victim while she testified although the statute did not provide for the GAL to be there. [Id. at pp. 6, 9-10]. The Petitioner states that the GAL's presence reassured the victim and made cross-examination less effective. [Id.]. The Petitioner also argues that allowing the victim to testify via closed-circuit television permitted the jury to make the impermissible inference that the closed-circuit television testimony was necessary to protect the child from Petitioner. [Id., Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus p. 5(g)]. At the omnibus hearing on August 3, 2006, the Petitioner voiced the above objections to the Court's allowance of closed-circuit testimony and also argued that the Court should not have permitted it because the GAL moved for closed-circuit testimony when the statute provides that only the State may do so.

The fact that the GAL filed the motion to used (sic) closed-circuit testimony instead of the State is inconsequential. The statute does not mention a GAL's ability to file the motion because the statute does not contemplate the appointment of a GAL. However, in this case the Court correctly appointed a GAL to represent the interest of a young child subjected to sexual abuse. The GAL properly fulfilled her role by filing motions to protect the physical, mental, and emotional well-being of the child. One of such motions was the motion to permit the victim to testify via closed-circuit television. If the GAL had not brought this motion, the Court is convinced that the State would have filed the motion and the same outcome would have resulted.

Contrary to the Petitioner's belief, the Court did hold a hearing, at which he was present and represented by counsel, on whether to permit the victim to testify by closed-circuit television. [State v. Ault, No. 00-F-22 p. 279, Order entered 2/19/02]. At that hearing, the Court received evidence from not one, but two master level psychologists, who both stated that the victim would be unable to communicate in the presence of the Petitioner. [Id.]. In the Order from the hearing, the Court made the requisite findings under the statute:

> The Court would find as follows:
> 1. That the alleged victim is competent to testify as a witness.
>
> 2. That due to the alleged victim's post traumatic stress syndrome, the size variance between she and the Defendant; her mental, emotional, and physical maturity level; her regression into former adverse behaviors after unintentionally seeing the Defendant in the community; her regression upon seeing men of similar physical description as the Defendant; and other factors set forth in the record, the witness would be unable to testify, absent the use of live, two-way closed-circuit television, due solely to being in the physical presence of the Defendant.
>
> 3. That due to the child witness' vulnerability; maturity level; mild mental retardation; ADHD, traumatic stressors in her life; and other factors set forth in the record, the witness can only testify if closed circuit television is used. Further, the psychologist who evaluated the witness for the Defendant also arrived at the same conclusions.
>
> 4. That the evidence would indicate that the victim's testimony is absolutely necessary in order for the State to fully proceed in the prosecution of the case. Absence of her testimony may preclude prosecution.
>
> In consideration of all of which, the Court would grant the Motion to permit the child witness to testify by closed-circuit television.

(Emphasis added). [Id.].

Although the Petitioner is correct that the Court did not follow the statutory procedures exactly, defense counsel agreed to the changes enacted by the Court. Specifically, in regards to using master level psychologists instead of a doctoral-level psychologist or social worker with five years experience, the Court and the attorneys had the following conversation:

> GUARDIAN AD LITEM M. ZELENE HARMAN: 'The new statute provides that either it's a doctorate level psychologist or a licensed clinical social worker, which of course, a licenced clinical psychologist falls somewhere in between ... there was a stipulation that Greg Trainor could provide that information ... I think we all recognize and acknowledged in the last matter that certainly Mr. Trainor has far more experience and education than a licensed clinical social worker with five years experience. That is allowed ...'
>
> DEFENSE ATTORNEY GARRETT: 'I would agree with that. I would definitely agree with that Your Honor, I mean ...'
>
> GAL: 'That, that is allowed to make that assessment and recommendation as a friend of the Court. And so certainly, it just didn't specify a licensed clinical psychologist. Either it was doctor's level psychologist or licensed clinical social worker. And there's a large, you know, space in there between that Mr. Trainor does fall into and he's had, I believe, twenty plus years experience in working with children.'
> [Id., Transcript of Pre-Trial Hearing on May 28, 2002, p. 4 line 17-p. 5 line 11, filed 1/13/03]. The Petitioner also agreed to allowing the GAL to be present in the room with the victim while she testified and stated that it might even be helpful. [Id. at p. 8 line 12-p. 9 line 22]. Even if the GAL's presence did reassure the victim, as the defense counsel pointed out, the GAL would have been able to present in the courtroom if the victim had testified from the witness chair and the GAL would have had the same reassuring effect. [Id.].

Moreover, as in Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 [110 S.Ct. 3157], supra p. 14, at trial, the victim was under oath to tell the truth. The defense counsel cross-examined the victim. The jury could see the victim and judge her demeanor while she testified. The jury watched the victim as they could any other witness testifying.

As for the jury's possible inference that the victim had to testify via closed-circuit television due to the Petitioner, the Court read the jury a cautionary instruction before the victim testified. In that instruction, the Court did not say that the victim was testifying via closed-circuit television because of the Petitioner; rather, the Court just said generally that sometimes children are afraid of the whole courtroom setting and therefore must testify via closed-circuit television. [State v. Ault, No. 00-F-22, Trial Transcript, p. 36 line 17-p. 37 line 15]. Therefore, the Court did not violate the Petitioner's right to confrontation by allowing the victim to testify via closed-circuit television.

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 169-176 (emphasis in original).

Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground five was not contrary to clearly established federal law. See Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 845, 110 S.Ct. 3157, 111 L.Ed.2d 666 (1990).[FN4]

[15] Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of the ground five involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings.[FN5] Prior to trial, the state court conducted a hearing to determine the child victim's competency and ability to testify in open court. The court heard evidence from two different master level psychologists, both of which found the child victim competent to testify, but unable to testify in open court with the petitioner present. The trial court made the appropriate findings of fact and determined that closed-circuit television testimony was necessary. To the extent that the trial court deviated from the statutory requirements for closed-circuit television testimony, those deviations either were with the consent of defense counsel or had no adverse effect on the petitioner's right of confrontation.

Accordingly, ground five should be denied.

F. Ground Six-Victim's Testimony was Uncorroborated and Inherently Incredible

[16] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that his conviction cannot stand because it was based on the uncorroborated and inherently incredible testimony of a child victim. In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that the child victim's testimony had no real or factual evidence to support it and that the testimony was coached and contradictory.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to prove that the victim's testimony was inherently unreliable or the result of suggestive interrogation techniques to the extent that it violated the Petitioner's right to a fair trial by due process of law as guaranteed in the U.S. Const. Amends. V and XIV and the WV Const. Art. III § 10.

>
> 'A conviction for any sexual offense may be obtained on the uncorroborated testimony of the victim, unless such testimony is inherently incredible, the credibility is a question for the jury.'

Syl. Pt. 3, Coleman v. Painter, 215 W.Va. 592, 600 S.E.2d 304 (2004) ...

The Petitioner argues that the Court should not have allowed the victim to testify at trial because her testimony was unreliable due to unfair interrogation techniques and her psychiatric and medical problems. [Ault v. Haines: No. 05-C-39, Supplemental Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus p. 5-6]. The Petitioner also contends that the victim's testimony was further improper because the Court did not require an assessment of the child based on her known problems. [Id. at p. 8]. At the omnibus hearing on August 3, 2006, the Petitioner argued that the Court should have held a pretrial hearing to determine if the victim was competent to testify.

In support of his claim that suggestive interrogation techniques were used on the victim, the Petitioner provides no evidence. The only exhibit presented to this effect is the transcript of an interview with the victim conducted by Lynn Foley on August 4, 2000. [Id., Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Exhibit A]. At the omnibus hearing, the Petitioner testified that he felt Ms. Foley used suggestive interrogation techniques because she would ask the victim the same question, repeatedly, until Ms. Foley 'got the answer she wanted.' The Court finds that this interview does not contain suggestive interrogation techniques. Lynn Foley is certified to question child victims of sexual abuse and the methods she used aimed at that end and not at leading the child to a foregone conclusion. Furthermore, in the assessment of the victim's capacity to testify via closed-circuit television, Mr. Trainor found that 'there is no evidence that [A.C.'s] statements have been coerced and the emotional reactions that she has are consistent with experiencing a traumatic event.' [State v. Ault: No. 00-F-22 p. 221, Consult on [A.C.'s] Ability to Testify in Open Court Versus Being Able to Testify by Closed Circuit Television].

The Petitioner also contends that the medications the victim was taking prior to and during the incident on August 2, 2000 caused her to be vulnerable to suggestive prompting and to manipulation by adults. In support of this theory, the Petitioner presents a self compiled list of all of the possible side effects of the drugs which the victim took and how they could have possibly affected her mind. [Ault v. Haines: No. 05-C-39, Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus Exhibit C 2]. However, the Petitioner offers no evidence that the victim suffered from any of these side effects or that they impaired her ability to think for herself in any way. There is no evidence that the medications made the victim susceptible to brainwashing, coaching, suggestive interrogation techniques, or memory replacement.

Furthermore, the Court did have the victim assessed by a licensed psychologist who reported that she would be able to testify reliably, accurately, and truthfully. The Court also held a hearing on the victim's ability to testify and found the victim to be competent to testify. [State v. Ault: No. 00-F-22 p. 206, Order entered 4/27/01]. Moreover, at that hearing the judge also conducted a West Virginia Rules of Evidence Rule 403 balancing test and determined that the victim's testimony was more probative to the charges than prejudicial to the Petitioner's case. [Id.].

As stated in the legal authorities above, the jury must judge the credibility of a witness' testimony. The victim testified under oath and was subject to cross-examination by the defense. The jury could see the victim as she testified and could observe her outward demeanor and the tone in which she answered questions. The Court did not err in allowing the victim to testify at trial especially considering the psychological evaluation done before trial, the pretrial hearing finding the victim competent to testify, and defense counsel's vigorous cross-examination of the victim at trial.

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 176-181.

Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground six was not contrary to clearly established federal law. See Marshall v. Lonberger, 459 U.S. 422, 434, 103 S.Ct. 843, 74 L.Ed.2d 646 (1983) (it is not within the province of the court to make credibility determinations).

Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground six involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings. Prior to trial, the victim was ordered to undergo a psychological evaluation to determine her competency and ability to testify. Resp't Ex. 13. The child victim was examined by a licensed psychologist who found that she was capable of receiving accurate impressions of the assault and that she was able to communicate them. Resp't Ex. 14. The licensed psychologist determined that the child victim knew the difference between telling the truth and a lie and that she was competent to testify as a witness at trial. Id. At trial, the jury heard the victim's testimony and was able to judge her credibility. Thus, the undersigned agrees with the state habeas court that the petitioner has failed to prove that the victim's testimony was inherently incredible.

Accordingly, ground six should be denied.

G. Ground Seven-Trial Court Erred in Denying Rule 29 Motion for Acquittal

[17] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the trial court erred in denying his Rule 29 Motion. In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that the petitioner made a proper Rule 29 Motion for Acquittal. The petitioner's motion was denied. The petitioner asserts that the denial of his motion was in error as the prosecution never presented any evidence that the petitioner was the individual accused of the crime. Because the petitioner was never identified as the perpetrator of the crime, he asserts that the state failed to prove an element of the prima facie case for which he was charged. In addition, the petitioner asserts that even taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, the State failed to present enough evidence to uphold the trial court's denial of his Rule 29 motion.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to assert a constitutional right violated by the trial court's denial of the Petitioner's motion for acquittal. Furthermore, the Petitioner failed to show that the Court erred in denying his Rule 29 Motion for Acquittal.

> 'A criminal defendant challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support a conviction takes on a heavy burden. An appellate court must review all the evidence, credit all inferences and credibility assessments that the jury might have drawn in favor of the prosecution. The evidence need not be inconsistent with every conclusion save that of guilt so long as the jury can find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Credibility determinations are for a jury and not an appellate court. Finally, a jury verdict should be set aside only when the record contains no evidence, regardless of how it is weighed, from which the jury could find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.' Syl. > The Petitioner argues that the Court erred in denying his motion for acquittal because there was no identification of the defendant by any witness, including the child-victim, either at the time of trial or pretrial. [Ault v. Haines: No. 05-C-39, Supplemental petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus p. 8]. The Petitioner also contends that the Court should have granted the motion for acquittal because he is actually innocent and the only evidence against him came from the uncorroborated testimony of a 'medicated, impaired little girl with a seizure disorder and fetal alcohol syndrome who had suffered sexual abuse in the past with no forensic evidence and a doctor's report indicating only prior abuse that the Petitioner could not possibly have committed.' >
> The alleged victim testified that the Petitioner sexually abused her. [State v. Ault; No. 00-F-22, Testimony of [A.C.], transcribed by County Court Reporters, p. 10 line 19]. She identified her perpetrator as Stoney, and Rock, the petitioner's nickname. [Id. at p. 7 lines 3-10]. During opening arguments, defense counsel alerted the jury to the Petitioner's nickname of Rock. [Id., Trial Transcript, p. 23 lines 3-5]. Furthermore, the investigating officer further testified that the victim indicated to him that Rock had sexually abused her, and the officer clearly stated on the record that Rock is a nickname for the Petitioner, Stoney Ault: ...

Based on the testimony given during the State's case in chief, the State presented ample evidence to identify the Petitioner as the perpetrator.

At the omnibus hearing on August 3, 2006, the Petitioner testified that he did not believe he had been identified because the victim did not point to him during trial and say, 'he did it.' A conviction does not require this type of identification.

Furthermore, as stated above, a conviction for sexual abuse can be obtained solely on the testimony of the victim unless the victim's testimony in (sic) inherently unreliable. Syl. Pt. 3, Coleman, 215 W.Va. 592 [600 S.E.2d 304], supra p. 23. The Court held a competency hearing on the victim's ability to testify reliably and accurately. [Id. at p. 206, Order entered 4/27/01]. The psychological evaluation, completed at the request of the Petitioner, concluded that the victim could accurately and truthfully testify as to the events that took place. [Id.]. The credibility of the victim is a matter to be decided by the jury. Based on the victim's testimony, the Court did not err in denying the Petitioner's motion for a directed verdict.

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 181-184

Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground seven was not contrary to clearly established federal law. See Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979) (when reviewing a claim of the sufficiency of the evidence in federal habeas review, the district court is required to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution and determine whether any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt); see also Wiggins v. Corcoran, 288 F.3d 629 (4th Cir.), cert. denied in part by, 537 U.S. 1027, 123 S.Ct. 556, 154 L.Ed.2d 441 (2002) (resolving conflicting facts and determining the credibility of the witnesses is for the jury, not the court).

Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground seven involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings. At trial, the child victim testified that the petitioner took her to the "pink room" where he pulled down her pants and underwear, set her on a machine, pulled down his own pants and got on top of her. Resp't Ex. 8 (Trial Transcripts) at 58-59. Thereafter, the victim alleged that the petitioner put his “weenie” in her “front” and his finger in her butt. Id. at 60. These events allegedly happened in the petitioner's home in Grant County, West Virginia, at a time when the petitioner was 51 years old and the child victim was seven. Moreover, at the time of the alleged incident, neither the petitioner nor the victim was married to anyone.

Also testifying at trial was Betty Puffenbarger, a case manager from the Potomac Center. Id. at 123-24. Ms. Puffenbarger testified that the petitioner and his girlfriend had been approved by the Potomac Center as a foster/respite home. Id. at 124. As part of their application, petitioners' girlfriend was listed as the primary caregiver and the petitioner as a secondary caregiver. Id. at 126-27. Moreover, Ms. Puffenbarger testified that at the time the child victim was allegedly assaulted, she was staying in the petitioner's home through his contract with the Potomac Center and that he was her custodian at that time. Id. at 126-30.

Based on this testimony alone, it is clear that there is sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding of guilt. The petitioner's identity was never an issue in this case. The child victim clearly and repeatedly alleged that the petitioner committed the crime. Indeed, it was never disputed that the alleged act took place in the petitioner's house during a time when the petitioner was acting as the victim's respite care provider through his contract with the Potomac Center. The key issue in this case was whether or not the jury believed that the victim had been sexually assaulted or abused by the petitioner. The victim testified that the petitioner did sexually abuse her, while the defendant testified that he did not. Thus, in order to render a verdict, the jury had to judge the credibility of the witnesses and resolve those issues of fact. Such determinations are properly the job of the jury and not within the province of federal habeas review.

Accordingly, ground seven should be denied.

H. Ground Eight-Failure to Give a Jury Instruction Proffered by the Defendant

[18] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the trial court erred in failing to give a jury instruction proffered by the defense. In support of this claim, the petitioner asserts that defense counsel requested a Payne instruction. See State v. Payne, 167 W.Va. 252, 280 S.E.2d 72, 77-78 (1981). According to the petitioner, a Payne instruction was necessary because the only witness to the crime was the child victim whose testimony was uncorroborated and failed to identify the petitioner as the perpetrator of the crime.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> The Court concludes that the Petitioner failed to prove that the trial court's failure to give the jury the Payne instruction denied the Petitioner of [his] right to a fair trial by due process of law.
>
> * * *
> ‘Jury instructions are reviewed by determining whether the charge, reviewed as a whole, sufficiently instructed the jury so they understood the issues involved and were not misled by the law. A jury instruction cannot be dissected on appeal; instead, the entire instruction is looked at when determining its accuracy. The trial court, therefore, has broad discretion in formulating its charge to the jury, so long as it accurately reflects the law. Deference is given to the circuit court's discretion concerning specific wording of the instruction, and the precise extent and character of any specific instruction will be reviewed for an abuse of discretion.' Syl. Pt. 4, Corbin, 218 W.Va. 315 [624 S.E.2d 752], supra p. 22.

'A Payne instruction concerns identification of the defendant. A Payne instruction does not concern the acts alleged to be perpetrated by the defendant.' State v. Williams, 206 W.Va. 300, 305, 524 S.E.2d 655, 660 (1999) ...

The Petitioner argues that the jury should have been given a jury instruction based on the Payne case because no witness identified him at trial and the child victim's testimony was uncorroborated. He contends that the Court's failure to give this instruction denied the Petitioner of his right to a fair trial. [Ault v. Haines; No. 04-C-2, Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus, p. 6, filed 1/12/ 04].

In Payne, the WVSC held that the trial court should have instructed the jury to scrutinize for veracity the uncorroborated identification testimony of the victim. State v. Payne, 167 W.Va. 252, 263, 280 S.E.2d 72, 79 (1981). The victim in Payne identified her assailant under the following circumstances:

> The record discloses that the prosecuting witness did not see her assailant until they were in a secluded, shaded area on the night the assault occurred. The record also disclosed that she gave [a] description of her assailant, prior to identifying the defendant, which were (sic) inconsistent with the defendant's physical appearance. We also note that the assault occurred on March 28, 1973, but the defendant was not identified as the assailant until May 9, 1973. There are indications in the record that the prosecuting witness may have been subjected to pressure by her father and the police to identify someone as her assailant between March 28 and May 9. Her initial identification of the defendant amounted to a statement that she 'believed' Robert Payne to be her assailant.

Id. at 260-261, [280 S.E.2d at] 77. Furthermore, in Payne, the defendant was prevented from testifying. Id.

In Ronnie R. v. Trent, 194 W.Va. 364, 460 S.E.2d 499 (1995), the defendant was accused of sexually molesting his oldest child from when the child was six years old until the child was eleven years old. On appeal of a habeas corpus petition, the defendant argued that the trial court erred in not declaring a mistrial for failure to give a Payne instruction. Id. The WVSC found that the trial court correctly determined that the Payne instruction would not have made a difference to the decision of the jury. Id. ...

The facts of the Petitioner's case do not mirror those of the defendant in Payne; however, they are similar to the facts in Ronnie R. As in Ronnie R., the victim knew the Petitioner prior to the abuse. Furthermore, the Petitioner testified at trial and refuted the allegations of abuse. As in Ronnie R., the Petitioner's identity is not at issue. The question was not WHO sexually abused the victim, but WHAT did the Petitioner do.

As discussed in ground four, supra, the State offered sufficient evidence to identify the Petitioner as the perpetrator of the sexual abuse. Furthermore, the Petitioner does not allege that someone else was alone with the victim when the abuse took place or that someone else could have perpetrated the abuse. [State v. Ault; No. 00-F-22, Trial Transcript p. 235 line 1-p. 266 line 24]. The only people around the victim at the time of the abuse where (sic) the Petitioner and the victim's little brother. Moreover, the Petitioner's counsel had the opportunity to argue and did argue that the Payne case applied; however, the Petitioner and his counsel did not convince the judge that the Payne instruction was a correct statement of law for this case. Finally, in its charge to the jury, the Court sufficiently instructed the jury on how to judge the credibility of witnesses. [Id., p. 276 line 7-p. 278 line 5]. Therefore, the Court did not violate the Petitioner's right to a fair trial by due process of law in failing to deliver the Payne instruction to the jury.

Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 185-188 (emphasis in original).

[19][20] Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground eight was not contrary to clearly established federal law. The Fourth Circuit has held that, "[o]rdinarily, 'instructions to the jury in state trials are matters of state law and procedure not involving federal constitutional issues,' and are therefore not reviewable in a federal habeas proceeding." Nickerson v. Lee, 971 F.2d 1125, 1137 (4th Cir.1992)(quoting Grundler v. North Carolina, 283 F.2d at 802), abrogation on other grounds recognized, Yeatts v. Angelone, 166 F.3d 255 (4th Cir.1999). "A federal court may grant habeas relief only when the challenged instruction 'by itself so infected the entire trial that the resulting conviction violates due process.' " Id. at 1137 (quoting Cupp v. Naughten, 414 U.S. 141, 147, 94 S.Ct. 396, 38 L.Ed.2d 368 (1973)). "A single instruction to a jury may not be judged in artificial isolation, but must be viewed in the context of the overall charge. While this does not mean that an instruction by itself may never rise to the level of constitutional error it does recognize that a judgment of conviction is commonly the culmination of a trial which includes testimony of witnesses, argument of counsel, receipt of exhibits in evidence, and instruction of the jury by the judge." Cupp v. Naughten, supra.

[21][22] In Neder v. United States, 527 U.S. 1, 119 S.Ct. 1827, 144 L.Ed.2d 35 (1999), the Supreme Court held "that the omission [of an element of an offense or an error in a jury instruction] is subject to harmless error analysis. As noted previously, under the harmless error standard, habeas relief must be granted if the error had 'substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict.' " Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. at 623, 113 S.Ct. 1710. "Under this standard, habeas petitioners may obtain plenary review of their constitutional claims, but they are not entitled to habeas relief based on trial error unless they can establish that it resulted in 'actual prejudice.' " Id. at 637, 113 S.Ct. 1710. "When a federal judge in a habeas proceeding is in grave doubt about whether a trial error of federal law had 'substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict,' that error is not harmless. And, the petitioner must win." O'Neal v. McAninch, 513 U.S. 432, 436, 115 S.Ct. 992, 130 L.Ed.2d 947 (1995).

Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground eight involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings. Syl. Pt. 5 of State v. Payne, 280 S.E.2d at 73 states:

> Where the State's case is based upon the uncorroborated and uncontradicted identification testimony of a prosecuting witness, it is error not to instruct the jury upon request that, if they believe from the evidence in the case that the crime charged against the defendant rests alone on the testimony of the prosecuting witness, then the jury should scrutinize such testimony with care and caution.

(Emphasis added). Moreover, the application of Payne has been limited to identification testimony. See State v. Williams, 206 W.Va. 300, 524 S.E.2d 655 (1999). Here, as noted by the state habeas court, the petitioner's identity was never in question. Thus, a Payne instruction was not appropriate.

Accordingly, ground eight should be denied.

I. Ground Nine-Giving Lesser Included Offense Instruction for First Degree Sexual Assault

In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the trial court erred by giving the lesser included offense instruction for first degree sexual assault. In support of this claim, the petitioner asserts that he was found guilty of the lesser included offense. Thus, the jury verdict shows disbelief in the child victim's testimony. Therefore, if the lesser offense instruction had not been given, the petitioner asserts that there would have been no conviction for First Degree Sexual Abuse or Sexual Abuse by a Custodian because the petitioner asserts that the jury's questions show that they were confused by the instructions. Moreover, the petitioner asserts that giving the instruction constitutes reversible error because it was an additional crime charged by the instructions that was not charged in the indictment. Finally, the petitioner asserts that the trial court inaccurately applied the law in finding that you must have sexual contact to have sexual intercourse or sexual intrusion.

The state habeas court's findings on the lesser included offense instruction are noted in ground one above. Moreover, as found in ground one, infra, the trial court did not err in giving the lesser included offense instruction for first degree sexual assault. Accordingly, ground nine should be denied.

J. Ground Ten-Cumulative Error Should have been Applied on Appeal

[23] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that the appellate court should have applied the cumulative error doctrine in this case. In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that his conviction should have been set aside because even if the court found harmless error in the issues raised, the cumulative effect of those errors renders his trial fundamentally unfair.

After the petitioner's Omnibus Evidentiary Hearing, the state habeas court found:

> Petitioner argues that the errors and omissions of his counsel should be considered cumulatively. He contends that the cumulative effect of his ineffective assistance of counsel, along with the numerous trial errors and prosecutorial misconduct, so prejudice the Petitioner's right to a fair trial that the result was a miscarriage of justice and a grievous wrong against the Petitioner. He states that the sum total and cumulative weight of these errors and misconduct are such that they should bar retrial, especially in the context of the irreparable damage and taint to the child by highly suggestive interrogation techniques. [Ault v. Haines; No. 05-c-39, Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus p. 5(k)] ...
>
> 'Cumulative error occurs where the record of a criminal trial shows that the cumulative effect of numerous errors committed during the trial prevented the defendant from receiving a fair trial, his conviction should be set aside, even though any one of such errors standing alone would be harmless error.' Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Smith, 156 W.Va. 385, 193 S.E.2d 550 (1972) ...
>
> The only error committed in the Petitioner's case, pretrial, during trial, or post trial, was his attorney's mistake in allowing the Petitioner's criminal history to be submitted to the jury on the forensic case submission report. The Court found that this error was harmless as the Court gave a curative instruction telling the jury that the information was irrelevant to the trial. Therefore, the Court finds that there is no cumulative error in the Petitioner's case which results in a miscarriage of justice.
> Resp't Amd. Ex. 6 at 242-243.

Upon an independent review of the record, the undersigned finds that the state court's adjudication of petitioners' ground ten was not contrary to clearly established federal law. See Fisher v. Angelone, 163 F.3d 835, 853 n. 9 (4th Cir.1998) ("legitimate cumulative-error analysis evaluates only the effect of matters actually determined to be constitutional error"); see also United States v. Rivera, 900 F.2d 1462, 1469 (10th Cir.1990) ("The cumulative effect of two or more individually harmless errors has the potential to prejudice a defendant to the same extent as a single reversible error. The purpose of a cumulative-error analysis is to address that possibility.").

Additionally, in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings, the undersigned does not believe that the state court's adjudication of ground ten involved an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law, nor do the state court's findings result in a decision that is based upon an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court proceedings. At best, the petitioner has established only one error, the submission of his prior criminal history to the jury. Further, the undersigned has determined that such error was harmless. Thus, the cumulative error analysis does not apply in this instance.

Accordingly, ground ten should be denied.

K. Ground Eleven-Plain Error; Faulty, Illegal and Amended Indictment

[24] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that a faulty, illegal and amended indictment was used to convict him. In support of this ground, the petitioner asserts that the instructions given to the jury do not appropriately charge the crimes as identified in the petitioner's indictment. Thus, the petitioner asserts that he was found guilty of crimes not charged in the indictment and his constitutional rights were violated.

[25] This ground was not raised on direct appeal or in the petitioner's state habeas petition. Thus, due to the petitioner's supplement, his petition is a now "mixed" petition.[FN6] Therefore, the Court has three options. First, the petition could be dismissed. See Rose v. Lundy, 455 U.S. 509, 522, 102 S.Ct. 1198, 71 L.Ed.2d 379 (1982) (petitions containing exhausted and unexhausted claims are subject to dismissal as "mixed" petitions). Second, the Court may stay the instant petition and allow the petitioner to return to state court to exhaust his unexhausted ground. See Rhines v. Weber, 544 U.S. 269, 275, 125 S.Ct. 1528, 161 L.Ed.2d 440 (2005) (in light of the "AEDPA's 1-year statute of limitations and Lundy's dismissal requirement, petitioners who come to federal court with 'mixed' petitions, run the risk of forever losing their opportunity for any federal review of their unexhausted claims"). Third, assuming that ground eleven can be denied on the merits, the Court may proceed with the case as filed. See 28 U.S.C. § 2254(b)(2) ("[a]n application for a writ of habeas corpus may be denied on the merits, notwithstanding the failure of the applicant to exhaust the remedies available in the courts of the State.") (emphasis added).

[26][27][28] Turning to the merits of the petitioner's claim, it has long been recognized that the United States Constitution does not require a State to charge a person by indictment. See Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516, 538, 4 S.Ct. 111, 28 L.Ed. 232 (1884). Thus, ground eleven fails to raise a claim of constitutional dimension and should be denied. Nonetheless, the undersigned notes that any variance between the proof adduced at trial and the charge contained in the indictment is harmless. See United States v. Castro, 776 F.2d 1118 (3d Cir.1985) (variance which does not change charging terms does not violate the 5th Amendment's Grand Jury clause).[FN7]

Accordingly, ground eleven should be denied.

L. Ground Twelve-Ineffective Assistance of Appellate Counsel

[29] In this ground, the petitioner asserts that appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to argue that his state habeas counsel was ineffective. Moreover, the petitioner asserts that appellate counsel failed to appropriately develop his claims on appeal. Thus, the petitioner asserts that appellate counsel was so defective as to require the reversal of his conviction.

There is no constitutional right to an attorney in state post-conviction proceedings. See Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551, 555, 107 S.Ct. 1990, 95 L.Ed.2d 539 (1987). Therefore, this ground is not cognizable on federal habeas review.

Accordingly, ground twelve should be denied.

IV. Recommendation

For the reasons set forth in this Opinion, it is recommended that the respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment (dckt. 25) be GRANTED and the petitioner's § 2254 petition be DENIED and DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE from the active docket of this Court.

Within ten (10) days after being served with a copy of this recommendation, any party may file with the Clerk of Court written objections identifying those portions of the recommendation to which objection is made and the basis for such objections. A copy of any objections should also be submitted to the Honorable Robert E. Maxwell, United States District Judge. Failure to timely file objections to this recommendation will result in waiver of the right to appeal from a judgment of this Court based upon such recommendation. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1); Thomas v. Arn, 474 U.S. 140, 106 S.Ct. 466, 88 L.Ed.2d 435 (1985); Wright v. Collins, 766 F.2d 841 (4th Cir.1985); United States v. Schronce, 727 F.2d 91 (4th Cir.1984), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1208, 104 S.Ct. 2395, 81 L.Ed.2d 352 (1984).

The Clerk is directed to send a copy of this Opinion/Report and Recommendation to the pro se petitioner by certified mail, return receipt requested, to his last known address as shown on the docket, and to counsel of record via electronic means.

FN1. The petitioner was accused of sexually assaulting a 7 year old girl who was in his care. At the time, the petitioner was 51 years old and had accepted the girl into his home as a respite care provider for the Potomac Center. The Potomac Center specializes in foster care and respite care placement for special needs children. The victim in this case was a foster child in the care of the Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) and suffered from seizure disorder, Attention Deficit Hyper Activity Disorder (ADHD), fetal alcohol syndrome and prior abuse and neglect. The victim was sent to the petitioner's home for temporary respite care placement when her foster father suffered a heart attack and was hospitalized. While in the care of the petitioner and his girlfriend, the victim alleged that the petitioner took her into a room at his house known as the “pink room,” put her on top of a piece of nautilus equipment, pulled her pants and underwear down, unzipped his pants and got on top of her.

The victim alleged that the petitioner then attempted to stick his “weenie” in her and that he put his finger in her butt. The victim alleged that it hurt, but that the petitioner was distracted by another foster child in the house and she was able to get up, put her clothes back on and get out of the situation. However, the victim also alleged that later that night, she was forced to sleep in the same bed as the petitioner where he again attempted to stick his “weenie” in her. When that was unsuccessful, the victim alleged that the petitioner took her into the bathroom, placed Vaseline on her vagina and stuck his finger inside her.

FN2. The petitioner's prior criminal history was not extensive. The form sent to the jury showed that the petitioner had an arrest for disorderly conduct and CDW. However, the jury did not know what CDW was and questioned the court about it. The Court told the jury that they were not to consider that evidence and that the information on the petitioner's prior criminal history was irrelevant to the case and should have been redacted from the form. The Court never told the jury that CDW stood for Carrying a Dangerous Weapon.

FN3. The court explained: “I wanted to let you know one loose end from the live closed-circuit television of the child this morning. If you saw somebody, blue shirt there beside her, at times, there beside her. That was M. Zelene Harman who is an attorney from Franklin, and very often when you have a child involved in any type of case, the Court appoints an attorney just to be with the child and assist them in their testimony, if they don't understand a question or things of that sort. So, that's who that was who was seated beside her. You probably may have just seen an arm, and you wondered whose arm that was, that's whose it was.” Resp't Ex. 8 (Trial Transcripts) at 87-88.

FN4. In Craig, the child witness was permitted to testify via closed-circuit television. The witness, the prosecutor, and defense counsel, withdrew to a separate room while the defendant remained in the courtroom with the judge and jury. A video monitor recorded and displayed the child's testimony to those in the courtroom. During this testimony, the child could not see the defendant and the defendant remained in contact with his counsel only through electronic communication.

FN5. “The central concern of the Confrontation Clause is to ensure the reliability of the evidence against a criminal defendant by subjecting it to testing in the context of an adversary proceeding before the trier of fact.” Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. at 845, 110 S.Ct. 3157. One way to ensure the reliability of the evidence against a criminal defendant is through face-to-face confrontation. Id. at 846, 110 S.Ct. 3157. Face-to-face confrontation reduces the risk that “a witness will wrongfully implicate an innocent person.” Id. However, although face-to-face confrontation “forms the core of the values furthered by the Confrontation Clause, we (the Supreme Court) have nevertheless recognized that it is not the sine qua non of the confrontation right.” Id. at 847, 110 S.Ct. 3157 (internal quotations and citations omitted). Therefore, “the Confrontation Clause is generally satisfied when the defense is given a full and fair opportunity to probe and expose testimonial infirmities [such as forgetfulness, confusion, or evasion] through cross-examination, thereby calling to the attention of the factfinder the reasons for giving scant weight to the witness' testimony." Id. (quoting Delaware v. Fensterer, 474 U.S. 15, 22, 106 S.Ct. 292, 88 L.Ed.2d 15 (1985)).

FN6. A "mixed" petition is one which contains both exhausted and unexhausted claims.

FN7. According to Castro, constructive amendment to an indictment occurs "when the charging terms of the indictment are altered." Castro, 776 F.2d at 1122. Constructive amendment to an indictment is a per se violation of the defendant's Fifth Amendment rights. Id. at 1121-22. If a variance occurs between the charge contained in the indictment, and the evidence adduced at trial, the elements of the offense remain unchanged and no violation of the defendant's rights occur unless there has been some prejudice. Id. In the petitioner's case, the elements of the offense charged in the indictment remained unchanged by the evidence adduced at trial. Thus, his indictment was not illegally amended.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County entered on February 3, 2006. In that order, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of Bradley R. to the infant children Breona R. and Austin G.[1] The circuit court also denied Bradley R.'s motion for post-termination visitation of both children. Bradley R. appealed the circuit court's adverse rulings against him. After reviewing the facts of the case, the issues presented, and the relevant statutory and case law, this Court affirms the decision of the circuit court.

I.

FACTS

On February 3, 2006, the Circuit Court of Mingo County terminated the parental rights of Bradley R. and Alisha G. to Breona R. and Austin G.[2] Physical and legal custody of the infant children was granted to the West Virginia Department of Health and [2]This appeal was brought by Bradley R. to address the circuit court's termination of his parental rights. The circuit court's disposition with regard to Alisha G. or toward any other party involved in the proceeding below is not the subject of this appeal.

Human Resources (DHHR) for permanent placement. Breona R. was born April 25, 2005, while Austin G. was born February 18, 2003. Alisha G. is the biological mother of both children, while Bradley R. is the biological father only to Breona R. Austin G.'s biological father, Larry W., voluntarily terminated his parental rights on September 27, 2005.

Several months prior to the termination of Bradley R.'s parental rights, on September 1, 2005, the DHHR filed an emergency petition alleging that Austin G. and Breona R. were in imminent danger, as outlined by West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(a) (2004).[3]

[3]West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(a), provides:

> Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible person found by the court to be a fit and proper person for the temporary care of the child pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child; and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child, including, but not limited to, the provision of medical, psychiatric, psychological or homemaking services in the child's present custody: Provided, That where the alleged abusing person, if known, is a member of a household, the court shall not allow placement pursuant to this section of the child or children in said home unless the alleged abusing person is or has been precluded from visiting or residing in said home by judicial order. In a case where there is more than one child in the home, or in the temporary care, custody or control of the alleged offending parent, the petition shall so state, and notwithstanding the fact that the allegations of abuse or neglect may pertain to less than all of such children, each child in the home for whom relief is sought shall be made a party to the proceeding. Even though the acts of abuse or neglect alleged in the petition were not directed against a specific child who is named in the petition, the court

In its petition, the DHHR alleged that Alisha G. and Bradley R. failed to cooperate with Child Protective Services (CPS) despite numerous visits to the home.

The DHHR believed that Alisha G. and Bradley R. were making efforts to avoid CPS since DHHR employees rarely saw the children when they stopped at their home. Alisha G. and Bradley R. often made excuses for Breona R.'s absences such as claiming the newborn was visiting friends in Virginia even though they were unable to provide names, addresses, or phone numbers of any of these individuals. The DHHR determined that Alisha G. and Bradley R. were not meeting the infant children's basic needs. For instance, there was no electricity in the home, the parents were neglecting the children's medical care by not keeping their scheduled doctors' appointments, and they were not getting the children's medical prescriptions filled.

> shall order the removal of such child, pending final disposition, if it finds that there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and a lack of reasonable available alternatives to removal. The initial order directing such custody shall contain an order appointing counsel and scheduling the preliminary hearing, and upon its service shall require the immediate transfer of custody of such child or children to the department or a responsible relative which may include any parent, guardian, or other custodian. The court order shall state: (1) That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and why; and (2) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and prevent the placement or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible. The order may also direct any party or the department to initiate or become involved in services to facilitate reunification of the family.

Another factor causing concern for the DHHR was the fact that Alisha G. tested positive for opiates and barbiturates at the time of Breona R.'s birth. Alisha later reported to CPS workers that she had taken Valium, Lortab, and Xanax prior to the birth of Breona R. While Breona R. did not test positive for drugs, she did have symptoms of withdrawal.

On April 27, 2005, Alisha G. signed a protection plan with CPS. At the time, both children were being kept by their paternal grandmother, Margaret V., who is a registered sex offender in the State of West Virginia. Years earlier, Margaret V. pled guilty to violating W.Va. Code § 61-8D-5B,[4] for knowingly procuring another person to engage or attempt to engage in sexual exploitation of a child under the age of sixteen years.[5] The circuit court found that both Margaret V. and her husband, Billy Ray V., had a long and adverse history with the DHHR and repeatedly failed to protect children in their care throughout the years.

[4]W.Va. Code § 61-8D-5(b), in part, provides:

> If any parent, guardian, custodian or other person in a position of trust in relation to the child shall knowingly procure another person to engage in or attempt to engage in sexual exploitation of, or sexual intercourse, sexual intrusion or sexual contact with, a child under the care, custody or control of such parent, guardian, custodian or person in a position of trust when such child is less than sixteen years of age, notwithstanding the fact that the child may have willingly participated in such conduct or the fact that the child may have suffered no apparent physical injury or mental or emotional injury as a result of such conduct, such parent, guardian, custodian or person in a position of trust shall be guilty of a felony . . . .

[5]Those proceedings did not involve Breona R. or Austin G.

In June of 2005, it was also determined by the Mingo County DHHR that Bradley R. had another child in Wyoming County, separate from the underlying proceedings involving Breona R. and Austin G. With regard to that child, there were substantiated facts of abuse and neglect against Bradley R. for substance abuse. At the time of the proceedings before this Court, that child was in foster care.

During a September 6, 2005, preliminary hearing, the circuit court granted Bradley R. a pre-adjudicatory improvement period for ninety days. The circuit court outlined specific requirements such as random drug and alcohol screens, parenting classes, undergoing psychological tests, and attending substance abuse counseling. On January 25, 2006, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of Bradley R. and denied his motion for post-termination visitation. It concluded:

> The evidence clearly reflects the Respondent father, Bradley R., has not meaningfully participated in these proceedings. At the Status hearing on September 27, 2005 the children's Guardian ad Litem reported both Respondent parents were doing well. However, since then, [Bradley R.] has failed to participate in services or to make substantial efforts. CPS Supervisor Webb testified the Department offered numerous services to [Bradley R.], including Advance Skills; Parenting training; Transportation assistance; In-home services through KVC and Family Options; Psychological evaluations, and; drug screening. [Bradley R.] was non-compliant with all offered services, and did not, in fact comply with any offered service. [Bradley R.] did not attend the Adjudicatory hearing, citing alleged transportation difficulties. [Bradley R.] was incarcerated during the Dispositional hearing but could have been transported to the hearing if he desired, or in the alternative, could have appeared via videoconference. However, he chose to voluntarily absent himself from the proceedings.

The circuit court found there was no reasonable likelihood that Bradley R. could substantially correct the conditions of abuse and neglect; that he had presented no evidence that he would meaningfully participate in an improvement period were he granted one by the circuit court; that he was unwilling to adequately care for the needs of the minor children, Austin G. and Breona R.; and that the continuation in his home was not in the best interests of the minor children. The circuit court permanently terminated Alisha G. and Bradley R.'s parental rights to Austin G. and Breona R. Bradley R. subsequently appealed the circuit court's order with regard to the termination of his parental rights and denial of post-termination visitation of both children.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In this case, Bradley R. contends that the circuit court erred in terminating his parental rights and denying his motion for visitation to his biological daughter Breona R. and to Austin G. This Court explained in In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000) that, "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." Also, in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court held that:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With these standards in mind, we now consider whether the circuit court erred in this case.

III.

DISCUSSION

In this case, Bradley R. maintains that it is in the best interests of Breona R. and Austin G. that both children be placed in his custody. He contends that in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), this Court held that when placing a child outside the custody of a natural parent, there is a preference to effectuate placement with the child's relatives. He further states that he has sought custody of both children from the beginning of the underlying proceedings and that he has a bond with both children.

Bradley R. further states that the DHHR initially did not oppose an Improvement Period for him, did not oppose visitation with the children, and that the circuit court granted custody to the DHHR in complete disregard to Maynard. He states that he was unable to attend the Dispositional Hearing because he was incarcerated at the time and maintains that due to his absence, the DHHR opposed placing the children with him and allowing him to have visitation. He believes that it would be in the children's best interest to be placed together in his home due to the familial relationship. Moreover, he states that the DHHR failed to prove he was an abusive parent and that the only allegation against him was that he had a substance abuse problem. He admits, however, that there were "slight instances" of domestic violence toward the children's mother Alicia G. Nonetheless, he concludes that since there were no allegations of abuse and/or neglect against him, he should have been granted custody of both children.

Conversely, Diana Carter Wiedel, the Guardian ad Litem for both children, states she is in complete agreement with the circuit court's ruling terminating Bradley R.'s parental rights. She states that Bradley R. was unwilling and unable to care for the children and maintains that he failed to participate in any of the DHHR's offered services or to comply with the circuit court's directives. She points out that the children are very young, need a permanent placement, and that at no time during the course of the proceedings has Bradley R. demonstrated any ability or desire to provide the children with a safe, stable, environment.

Likewise, the DHHR responds that according to this Court in In re R.J.M, 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), termination of parental rights may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when there is no likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected as outlined by W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(b).[6]

[6]W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(b), provides:

> (b) As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be considered to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
>
> (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such person or persons have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning;
>
> (2) The abusing parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the child's return to their care, custody and control;
>
> (3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other

Having thoroughly reviewed the entire record as well as the relevant statutory and case law in this matter we agree with the DHHR. This Court has held that:

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus Point 4, In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989). In addition, this Court has declared that:

> "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened ...." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus Point 7, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Moreover,

> "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect > rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child;

> the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Syllabus Point 5, West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

In this case, Bradley R. was given numerous opportunities to become a part of these children's lives, but chose not to do so. For instance, in its September 6, 2005, order, the circuit court ordered psychological testing for both Alicia G. and Bradley R., along with random drug and alcohol screening, parenting classes, substance abuse counseling, and supervised visitation with the children one time per week. In spite of the circuit court's order, Bradley R. did not visit the infant children a single time during the months of November and December 2005. Moreover, he did not keep his appointment for psychological treatment, attend parenting classes, or cooperate with in-home drug screens. He also failed to attend the December 5, 2005, adjudicatory hearing, and did not attend the January 26, 2006, final dispositional hearing. We recognize that at the time of the January 26, 2006, hearing, Bradley R. was incarcerated at the South West Regional Jail. Nonetheless, even though he was aware of the hearing and knew his parental rights were at stake, he made no request to be transported, nor did he request to appear via video conference.

It is clear to us that the DHHR made every effort to allow Bradley R. to be a good parent and he failed to partake in any of the services offered. Moreover, his failure to appear at court hearings to protect his interests, knowing that his rights to his children were in jeopardy, coupled with his lack of action with the directives of case law and the West Virginia State Code, lead us to conclude that the circuit court was correct in terminating the parental rights of Bradley R.

With regard to Bradley R.'s contention that he should have received post-termination visitation, the DHHR maintains that when no bond exists with the children, the consideration of post-termination visitation is not required. The DHHR contends that the circuit court properly denied such visitation. We agree.

We have long recognized that "[w]hen parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syllabus Point 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

In the case at hand, the DHHR made repeated efforts to visit with the infant children attempting to make sure that they were being properly cared for by Bradley R. and Alisha G. During those numerous visits, the DHHR found that Breona R. was not in the home for weeks at a time, but rather was "staying with friends in Virginia" even though she was only a newborn. The DHHR believed that Bradley R. was making an effort to avoid CPS since DHHR employees rarely saw the children when they stopped at their home. It further determined that neither Bradley R. nor Alisha G. were meeting the infant children's basic needs which included their medical care.

We find no evidence in the underlying facts to conclude that Bradley R. has developed a bond with either of these children. In fact, with regard to Breona R., the infant child has been in the custody of the DHHR since she was five months old and has been in her current foster home longer than she was in Bradley R.'s home. Furthermore, Austin G., who is not the biological child of Bradley R., never continuously lived in Bradley R.'s home. Instead, Austin G. spent a great deal of time with his grandparents, one of whom is a registered sex offender. Moreover, Bradley R. did not make a single visit with the children in November or December of 2005 despite having the opportunity to see them and with the full knowledge that his parental rights were in jeopardy. In addition, Bradley R. did not bother to take the drug tests the circuit court ordered, did not have a psychological examination completed, and did not attend parenting classes.

The DHHR points out that Austin G. and Breona R. are currently together in a pre-adoptive home where they have resided since March 2006 and are doing well in their placement. Conversely, as previously discussed, Bradley R. has made no effort to rectify his situation and there is no evidence that he has attempted to resolve the issues surrounding his drug use. This is further evidenced by the unresolved separate action filed against him by the DHHR in Wyoming County wherein Bradley R. was charged with substantiated abuse and neglect against him for substance abuse with regard to another child who is not a part of these proceedings. Moreover, Bradley R.'s actions with regard to his refusal to comply with any of the circuit court's directives demonstrate a willful rejection and unwillingness to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the children's return to his care, custody and control.

Finally, Bradley R.'s failure to follow through with any rehabilitative efforts of "social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child" weigh heavily in this Court's decision. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(b). Thus, due to Bradley R.'s drug use, his failure to have any meaningful participation in his improvement period, along with his refusal to attend scheduled court hearings, we believe it is not in the best interest of these children to have post-termination visitation with Bradley R.

Consequently, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in terminating Bradley R.'s parental rights and denying his motion for post-termination visitation. Therefore, we affirm the February 3, 2006, final order of the circuit court.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County entered on February 3, 2006, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Per Curiam:

The respondent below and appellant herein, Rosemary C. (hereinafter "Rosemary"), appeals from an order entered July 3, 2008, by the Circuit Court of Mineral County. By that order, the circuit court denied Rosemary's motion for a post-dispositional improvement period and terminated any parental rights to Tiffany B.[1] (hereinafter "Tiffany"), Patricia B. (hereinafter "Patricia"), Joshua B. (hereinafter "Joshua"), Brandon B. (hereinafter "Brandon"), and Tessa F. (hereinafter "Tessa"), all children to whom Rosemary had no biological relation.[2] The lower court's order further denied post-termination visitation. On appeal to this Court, Rosemary argues that the circuit court erred in denying her post-dispositional improvement period and in terminating her parental rights. Rosemary also alleges some procedural improprieties that will be discussed in this opinion.[3] Based on the

[2]On appeal to this Court, only three children are at issue: Patricia, Joshua, and Brandon. Two siblings, Kenneth and Brittany, born 1989 and 1990, respectively, reached the age of majority during the earlier proceedings and are no longer part of these proceedings. This Court recognizes that Tiffany also reached the age of majority in September 2009, and thus, is no longer under this Court's jurisdiction in this matter. Further, Rosemary did not appeal the denial of her parental rights and/or visitation with regard to Tessa. Thus, this Court will decide the issues only as they relate to the remaining three children.

[3]Specifically, Rosemary argues that the lower court erred by improperly obtaining testimony from the children involved; considering the relative wealth or poverty of her situation in deciding whether to terminate parental rights; issuing its dispositional order in violation of the applicable time periods; and failing to appoint counsel for her son, Hiram C. (hereinafter "Hiram"), even after it was apparent that his actions or inactions could

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The petitioner, Rosemary, is currently in her mid-seventies and her son, Hiram, is in his mid-forties. Previously, the two lived together in Baltimore, Maryland. While living in Maryland, Rosemary and Hiram came to care for seven children, none of whom were related by blood or marriage to either Rosemary or Hiram.[4] The biological parents[5] of the children were drug addicts and were acquaintances with one of Rosemary's directly affect Rosemary's improvement period.

[4]While Rosemary is the only petitioner whose rights are before this Court, the record reveals that the children referred to Rosemary as "mom" and to Hiram as "dad." It is undisputed that Hiram was a caretaker of the children during the time that they were in Rosemary's home. Moreover, some of the allegations in the abuse and neglect petition were directed to Hiram's conduct. Hiram's actions were an issue in the case plan, and he was subjected to court-mandated counseling and services. Further, the circuit court's dispositional order found that "[Hiram] has been treated as a party in this case . . . and signed the treatment plan." Significantly, the lower court ordered as follows: "That any parental rights, including visitation of Rosemary . . . and Hiram . . . to Tiffany . . . Patricia . . . Joshua . . . Brandon . . . and Tessa . . . are hereby TERMINATED." During an April 16, 2008, status hearing in the underlying case, Rosemary's counsel made a motion for Hiram to receive court-appointed counsel. Hiram indicated to the lower court that he was willing to proceed in the matter without representation of counsel; however, it does not appear that he was ever designated as a party in this action.

[5]All of the children in Rosemary's care had the same biological parents with the exception of Tessa.

biological children. When the biological parents could not care for their children, Rosemary would take informal temporary custody. This process continued as each of the six sibling children were born and with the one child who was unrelated to the other six children. Rosemary was granted legal custody and guardianship of the children in the Circuit Court of Baltimore City Division for Juvenile Cases in April 1999; however, the biological parents' rights were never terminated by the Maryland courts. The Maryland court terminated its jurisdiction over the matter in 2006.

In 2001, Rosemary and Hiram moved to West Virginia with these seven children. Soon thereafter, in March 2001, the children were brought to the attention of Child Protective Services (hereinafter "CPS"). Over the next several years, eleven different referrals were sought for various reasons. The referrals were investigated and some of the allegations contained therein were unsubstantiated. However, the referrals that were substantiated included instances of emotional abuse, physical abuse, improper threats of sending the children away for bad behavior, improper punishment by withholding food, illegal drug abuse in the home by adults, an unhealthy home with cockroaches falling from the ceiling, farm animals in the home, flea infestation resulting in bites to the children, and failure on Rosemary's part to complete the paperwork necessary for medical coverage for the children. Moreover, one of the children, Patricia, is ill with Hepatitis C.[6] It was found that this child was forced to use a bucket outside of the home as separate toilet facilities. She was also forced to use different eating and drinking utensils from the rest of the family. The Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") also noted its concerns about the children living in the same home as adults with extensive criminal backgrounds.[7]

Based upon these referrals and concerns, a general abuse and neglect petition was filed by the DHHR against Rosemary on June 12, 2007.[8] In addition to Rosemary, other biological mother stabbed her with a dirty needle used for drug abuse. This incident occurred prior to t he time when Patricia came to be in Rosemary's care.

[7]Hiram has a felony record with convictions for drug possession and transportation of firearms. At one time, at least two other adults, Rosemary's daughter and grandson, lived in the home. The daughter was awaiting trial on charges related to driving under the influence. Her criminal background also included larceny, stalking, obstruction, and telephone misuse. The grandson's criminal background included charges of arson, theft, destruction of property, obstruction, harm and injury, assault, verbal threats, and conspiracy. Since the institution of the underlying proceedings, the daughter and grandson have left the home and have not returned. The children have reported various instances of Hiram and other adults acting strangely and in ways that the children believed illustrated drug use.

[8]The CPS referrals began in 2001. While we recognize that not every referral was substantiated and that there was also the issue of continuing jurisdiction in the Maryland courts, it seems that the delay in bringing the abuse and neglect petition was extensive and only served to prolong the children's exposure to an unstable home. See Syl. pt. 1, in part, and Syl. pt. 5, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) ("Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.") ("The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible."). The delays do not appear to be a result of the circuit court or its docket, but rather, a delay in filing the petition parties included in the underlying proceedings were the biological parents of the six sibling children, as well as the biological mother of the other child who was unrelated to the other six children.[9] During the court proceedings in West Virginia, the biological parents' rights to the six sibling children were terminated on December 12, 2007.[10] The biological mother's rights to Tessa are still pending in the circuit court. Of the seven children in Rosemary's care, only three of them are at issue before this Court, all of whom are related to each other by blood but are not related to either Rosemary or Hiram by blood. The three children at issue in this appeal are Brandon, born 1993; Patricia, born 1995; and Joshua, born 1999.[11]

As early as September 2004, the family was referred for various services including Family Preservation, Juvenile Probation, and Youth Services. Parenting plans at the outset. However, the record is unclear as to any discernible reason for the delay.

[9]All of the children in Rosemary's care had the same biological parents with the exception of Tessa. Rosemary's rights with regard to Tessa are not at issue before this Court as neither person desires interaction with the other person, and Rosemary did not appeal the termination of her parental rights and denial of visitation with Tessa.

[10]Termination of the biological parents' rights is not at issue in this appeal.

[11]As of the time of oral argument, Tiffany, Patricia, and Joshua were placed in foster care. Patricia and Joshua are together in the same placement. Tiffany reached the age of majority in September 2009. Brandon was removed from the home in January 2007 as a result of a juvenile and/or status offense petition. He was ultimately placed in a residential treatment facility and remains in that placement at this time. His eventual placement is undetermined.

were designed and counseling was ordered. It was found that Rosemary and Hiram initially were not compliant in taking advantage of these ordered programs. It was also found that Rosemary and Hiram were not compliant with the court-ordered sibling visitation with siblings who had been removed from the home on juvenile petitions. During the lower court proceedings, it was found that Rosemary had a habit of filing juvenile petitions on the children as they got older. The lower court specifically found that > [a]s soon as a child gets old enough to report abuse, Rosemary would file a juvenile petition to get rid of and punish the child. That child is then shunned by Rosemary and Hiram.

> Once a child is on the "shunned list", there is an effort to exclude that child from her [or his] siblings.

As a result of the June 2007 abuse and neglect petition, the DHHR was granted legal custody of the children, but physical custody remained with Rosemary. A status hearing was held August 31, 2007, regarding a Motion for Contempt filed against Rosemary, wherein the lower court ruled that Rosemary was in contempt for intentionally interfering with sibling visitation that had been previously ordered to occur between the children remaining in her care and their sibling sister who had been removed from the home on a juvenile petition. Because Hiram's actions also contributed to the lack of compliance with visitation, he was also subjected to the same continuing terms and conditions as Rosemary.

In September 2007, an amended abuse and neglect petition was filed by the DHHR. This petition alleged that Rosemary had allowed the children's medical cards to lapse. The DHHR was granted physical custody of the children due to this failure by Rosemary, which resulted in the children being denied continued services from Family Preservation Services and Mountain State Psychological. The children were removed from the home and placed in various foster homes, with only Joshua and Patricia remaining together in the same placement.

On October 3, 2007, an adjudicatory hearing was held and the parties informed the lower court that they had reached an agreed adjudication for the trial court to approve. The stipulations of the parties included Rosemary's concessions that the children had been exposed to inappropriate discipline in her home, resulting in both physical and emotional abuse. She further agreed that she had failed to participate with in-home services and social services recommended by the DHHR; and that the living conditions in her home had been less than adequate for the health, benefit, and welfare of the children. The lower court made a finding that the minor children were abused and/or neglected children and that continued physical custody by Rosemary was not in the children's best interests. The lower court granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period to Rosemary. In that time, Rosemary was directed to participate in counseling recommended by her psychological evaluation and to attend all counseling, medical, psychological, psychiatric, and parenting appointments or sessions determined necessary by the MultiDisciplinary Team (hereinafter "MDT"). The goals were to address the necessary parenting issues needed to protect the children, to improve the living conditions in the home, and to maintain current medical cards on the children.

The DHHR filed its Family Treatment Plan on February 14, 2008. The plan included the following eight items that must be remedied during the improvement period:

> 1. Rosemary and Hiram have a history of not following through with services which resulted in the removal of the children from the family home.
>
> 2. Rosemary and Hiram file incorrigibility petitions on the children when they reach a certain age, indicating that the child is out of control. The child is then shunned by the other children because Rosemary and Hiram tell them not to speak to the child.
>
> 3. The family home is in disarray and through reports of service providers there are cockroaches everywhere crawling on the floors, walls and falling from the ceiling this creates an unhealthy environment for the children to live in due to cockroaches carrying disease.
>
> 4. The children report physical and emotional abuse as evidenced by reports of being pushed down the stairs, pushed against the walls, beat up by the other children while being held down by Hiram. Patricia has indicated that she had to toilet in a bucket in the home and was not allowed to use the family bathroom. The bucket was moved to a trailer outside and she was forced to use that. Patricia was also told regularly that she would die by the time she is sixteen. The other children report that Hiram would get angry with them and hang a sign on his door that he is not their father and they have to call him by his given name. Hiram and Rosemary do not permit the children to associate with black children because they do not like them. If caught the children are shunned.
>
> 5. The children have reported that [various other adults] would stay at the home and use drugs with Hiram. When this would happen the children were exposed to people being passed > out and possibly overdosing on the drugs.[12]

>
> 6. Hiram and Rosemary have not recognized the problems in the home. They have not realized the impact that their actions and words have had on the children. They do not feel the children have been abused emotionally or physically. They view themselves as the victims in the case. They feel the children are being allowed to run the court and MDT and that the MDT should not be listening to the children's wishes although all of the children at one time or another have expressed that they do not want to return to the family home.
>
> 7. The children have many concerns about returning home. They are concerned about the treatment they would receive if they return to the family home.
>
> 8. Hiram does not have any means of support.

(Footnote added).

On April 16, 2008, a status hearing was held to review the improvement period and the case plan. Rosemary's counsel's motion to meet with the children, in the presence of their guardian ad litem, was granted for the purpose of ascertaining the children's wishes on where they would like to reside. The same counsel also made a request for Hiram to receive independent court-appointed counsel, which was denied.[13] DHHR was requested to file the Children's Case Plan by June 1, 2008. In an order entered June 13, 2008, the circuit court acknowledged receipt of the DHHR's Children's Case Plan. In that plan, the DHHR stated that > [w]hile participating in services the MDT has seen a significant amount of improvement from both Hiram and Rosemary. They have become more open to the children and dealing with them at their present ages. They have acknowledged a lack of information regarding Patricia's illness and apologized for their treatment of her during a family session. Both Hiram and Rosemary have listened to what the children have to say and how the children are feeling and then address the issues at hand. Both have learned to recognize the need to work together on the disciplining of the children so that the children can not triangulate the situation to achieve whatever goal they may have at the time. The children have become increasingly comfortable with Hiram and Rosemary. They have been able to express their fears without concerns of being shunned by Hiram. The children have had moments of wanting to return to the home and other moments of wanting to remain in foster care. Due to the family's successful completion of the treatment plan, the Department has no alternative but to recommend reunification of the children with Hiram and Rosemary[.]

Therein, the DHHR recommended a reunification plan with the goal to transition Tiffany, Patricia, Joshua, and Brandon, upon completion of his residential treatment program, back to Rosemary's home. In its June 13, 2008, order, the circuit court advised that it did not agree with the DHHR's assessment of the case and that it had reservations about the permanency plan for the children. Therefore, the lower court directed that the dispositional hearing scheduled for June 19, 2008, be held pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-5D-3a (2004) (Repl. Vol. 2004)[14] and that the MDT should present evidence as to its rationale for the proposed service plan.

A dispositional hearing was held June 19, 2008. Testimony was heard from the child protective services worker, a clinical therapist who provided individual and family therapy, a case manager and counselor who provided parenting training, and two psychologists who provided therapy to the children. All of the witnesses indicated their recommendation that reunification be attempted between the children and Rosemary. At the conclusion of the testimony, all counsel, including the children's guardian ad litem, recommended that the children be returned to Rosemary's home with continued services and oversight by the DHHR. The matter was taken under advisement by the lower court, which set forth its findings of fact and conclusions of law in its Dispositional Hearing Order entered

If the multidisciplinary team cannot agree on a plan or if the court determines not to adopt the team's recommendations, it shall, upon motion or sua sponte, schedule and hold within ten days of such determination, and prior to the entry of an order placing the child in the custody of the department or in an out-of-home setting, a hearing to consider evidence from the team as to its rationale for the proposed service plan. July 3, 2008. In its order, the lower court stated that > in this case there is ample evidence already in the record to show that the treatment goals have not been met, that the Department [DHHR] chose to ignore significant facts, that both respondents testified falsely, and that the best interest of these children will not be served by returning them to this strange home.

(Emphasis in original). The lower court's order emphasized its conclusions that Rosemary and Hiram failed to follow through with services, that they filed incorrigibility petitions on children when they reach a certain age and then shun that child, that the house is in disarray with little or no food and a flea infestation problem, that Hiram and Rosemary have failed to appreciate the extent of the physical and emotional abuse suffered by the children as a result of their actions and inactions, that the children were exposed to illegal drug abuse by adults in the home, and that Hiram and Rosemary view themselves as victims and fail to understand the impact of their behavior on the children. Moreover, the children, during an interview with the court on June 12, 2008, indicated their fear and concern about treatment they would receive if they were returned to the home, as well as the treatment they would receive if they did not want to return home, including Rosemary and Hiram's anticipated refusal to let them visit any of their siblings who might have returned to the home. The lower court's order further identified as a major concern that Hiram has no means of support, and identifying that there is a question as to whether Hiram and Rosemary can afford to feed and clothe the four children at issue.[15] Significantly, in regards to the current placements of the children outside of the home, the lower court order found that "[a]ll of these children continued to improve until contact with Hiram and Rosemary was increased. Their behavior then deteriorated." (Empahsis in original).

> The disposition in the lower court's order was stated as follows:
>
> > The Court has seriously considered whether to grant a dispositional period of improvement. However, the Court denies the request for the following reasons:
> >
> > 1. There is no reason to believe that [Rosemary and Hiram] will change as has been set forth previously.
> >
> > 2. Any trial placement back in the home that didn't work out would disrupt and possibly make return to current placements for the children impossible.
> >
> > 3. The children have regressed when they are around Rosemary and Hiram.
> >
> > 4. Given what has happened in this case, this Court simply cannot trust the members of this MDT to recognize and report to the Court if something were to go wrong.

The order directed "[t]hat any parental rights, including visitation of Rosemary . . . and Hiram . . . to Tiffany . . . Patricia . . . Joshua . . . Brandon . . . and Tessa . . . are hereby [15]Rosemary reports her income from social security as $793.00 per month. Hiram reports that he has applied for social security disability for depression, nervousness, and a heart valve problem. He occasionally performs odd jobs, which can total $400.00 to $500.00 per month in income, but there is no record evidence demonstrating the continuity of this income.

TERMINATED." The lower court further denied requests for post-termination visitation stating that "further visitation is not in the children's best interests. It is clear from the reports . . . that the children regress when they have contact with Hiram and Rosemary. . . . The children need a clean break." DHHR was ordered to provide for significant visitation among the children. It is from this order that Rosemary appeals to this Court.

Subsequent to the lower court's dispositional order, the DHHR has now filed a response with this Court wherein it alters the earlier recommendation made to the lower court. Because the children have improved so dramatically in their current placements, and because they seem to regress when they have any contact with Rosemary, DHHR is now advocating that the children remain in their current placements and that visitation with Rosemary occur only at the discretion of the individual children. Additionally, two new guardians ad litem subsequently were appointed because the original guardian ad litem took a public office and could no longer be involved in the case.[16] The two new guardians performed their own independent assessment, including home visits and interviews. Their opinions are that the children's best interests are to sever all contact with Rosemary and [16]The original guardian ad litem in the case submitted a letter for this Court's use in this appeal. In that letter, the guardian opined that reunification was the most reasonable recommendation at the time of the dispositional hearing. However, due to the passage of time and the children's successful placements, he now recommends that the parental rights of Rosemary be terminated, but that visitation be allowed.

Hiram. The two guardians opine that there is ample concern for continuing emotional problems for the children and also conclude that the home is unsafe and uninhabitable for children. They do not recommend visitation. The guardians ask this Court to remand the case for the lower court to continue proceedings in accordance with its dispositional order so that permanency can be achieved for the children.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This case is before this Court on appeal from the circuit court's order denying Rosemary's request for a post-dispositional improvement period and denying her request for post-termination visitation. This Court has previously explained that, in the realm of an abuse and neglect case,

> [a]lthough conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Mindful of the applicable standards, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, Rosemary argues that the circuit court erred in denying her post-dispositional improvement period and in terminating her parental rights. Rosemary also alleges some procedural improprieties. Specifically, Rosemary asserts that the trial judge improperly obtained the testimony of the children and used these statements in violation of Rule 8 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.[17]

[17]The relevant portion of Rule 8 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides as follows:

> (b) Procedure for taking testimony from children. – The presiding judicial officer may conduct in camera interviews of a minor child, outside the presence of the parent(s). The parties' attorneys shall be allowed to attend such interviews, except when the presiding judicial officer determines that the presence of attorneys will be especially intimidating to the child witness. When attorneys are not allowed to be present for in camera interviews of a child, the presiding judicial officer shall, unless otherwise agreed by the parties, have the interview electronically or stenographically recorded and make the recording available to the attorneys before the evidentiary hearing resumes. Under exceptional circumstances, the presiding judicial officer may elect not to make the recording available to the attorneys but must place the basis for a finding of exceptional circumstances on the record. . . .

This Court recognizes that the lower court met with the children individually on June 12, 2008, as stated in the trial court's Dispositional Hearing Order. There is no indication that

Further, she contends that the lower court improperly considered her modest income in deciding whether to terminate rights.[18] She also contends that the dispositional order was improperly entered more then ten days from the hearing date in violation of Rule 36 of the

the guardian ad litem was present, that notice was presented to any parties, or that a record was made of the interviews. While we find the procedure utilized by the lower court was error, we are satisfied that such error was harmless. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, Original Glorious Church of God In Christ, Inc. of Apostolic Faith v. Myers, 179 W. Va. 255, 367 S.E.2d 30 (1988) (per curiam) ("'[T]his Court will disregard and regard as harmless any error, defect or irregularity in the proceedings in the trial court which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties.' Syl. pt. 2, Boggs v. Settle, 150 W. Va. 330, 145 S.E.2d 446 (1965)."). Notwithstanding any information learned by the circuit court during these interviews with the children, the record is replete with evidence properly relied on by the circuit court as a foundation for its underlying decisions.

[18]In this Court's previous case of State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 695-96, 356 S.E.2d 181, 188-89 (1987), we recognized "the existence of a bias in favor of having the child with someone who is more economically secure[.]" In addressing this matter, we stated that

> [p]etitions for termination of parental rights are particularly vulnerable to the risk that judges or social workers will be tempted, consciously or unconsciously, to compare unfavorably the material advantages of the child's natural parents with those of prospective adoptive parents and therefore to reach a result based on such comparisons rather than on the statutory criteria.

Id. (internal citations omitted). We find that a fair reading of the lower court's order reveals that Rosemary's modest economic status was not the basis for any termination decisions. Rather, one of the concerns enumerated by the circuit court was the apparent lack of evidence that would illustrate that these two people could adequately feed and clothe these children. This fear was further bolstered by the reports in the record that the children, upon being placed in foster care outside of Rosemary's home, were amazed to find food in the refrigerator. Moreover, the foster parents indicated that some of the children displayed hoarding tendencies with their food as if they were afraid that more food would not be available in the future. Thus, we find Rosemary's argument wholly without merit.

Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.[19] Finally, because her son, Hiram, was also included in the improvement periods, Rosemary contends that he should have been appointed counsel.[20]

[19]The relevant portion of Rule 36 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides that "[t]he court shall enter a disposition order, including findings of fact and conclusions of law, within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the [dispositional] hearing." In the present case, the dispositional hearing took place on June 19, 2008; and the order was entered July 3, 2008. In the absence of any time computation specified in the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, this Court resorts to Rule 6 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure for time computation, which provides as follows:

> In computing any period of time prescribed or allowed by these rules, by the local rules of any court, by order of court, or by any applicable statute, the day of the act, event, or default from which the designated period of time begins to run shall not be included. . . . When the period of time prescribed or allowed is fewer than 11 days, intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays shall be excluded in the computation.

Following the time computation rules, the order was properly entered on the tenth day following the dispositional hearing.

[20]We find this argument to be without merit. Rosemary is the only party who had received guardianship rights from the Maryland courts. See note 4, supra. See also Syl. pt. 1, *Maples v. Initially, the DHHR and the original guardian ad litem advocated for the return of the children to the care of Rosemary, and this was the position advanced during the underlying proceedings. However, because these children have been in the same placement since 2007 and are doing extremely well and only seem to regress with any contact with Rosemary, the DHHR is now advocating that the children remain in their current placements and that visitation with Rosemary occur only at the discretion of the individual children. The current guardians ad litem concur with the position of the DHHR expressed on appeal to this Court, with the exception that the guardians recommend that no visitation occur between the children and Rosemary.

As previously explained by this Court, "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). Further guidance is provided as follows:

> "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions > of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P.,182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

Syl. pt. 7, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589. Further, "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. pt. 7, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Thus, this Court elevates the health and welfare of the children above any parental rights of Rosemary to these children.

Significantly, in this case, the lower court found "by clear and convincing evidence that [Rosemary and Hiram] have failed to substantially comply with the treatment plan and the terms of the post-adjudicatory period of improvement." Therefore, the trial court rejected the Children's Case Plan. In this regard, this Court has held that,

> [a]t the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

Syl. pt. 6, In the Interest of Carlita B., id. While all of the MDT personnel opined that Rosemary had made great strides in her improvement period, the lower court found that she had failed to comply with the period of improvement. The lower court acknowledged that Rosemary had performed better toward the end of the treatment period; however, the court found that a view of the overall treatment period showed that little progress had actually been made. The lower court emphasized Rosemary and Hiram's history of failing to follow through with services, the emotional abuse experienced by the children as a result of juvenile petitions filed by Rosemary against the children when they reach a certain age, and the family shunning that continued even in the midst of group therapy sessions. Further, while Rosemary appears to have attempted to eradicate the cockroach problem from her house, there was recent evidence of a problem with flea infestations, which resulted in multiple bites to one of the children during a visit. Significantly, as found by the lower court, Rosemary fails to appreciate the extent of the physical and emotional abuse suffered by the children as a result of the actions and inactions by both Rosemary and Hiram.

The children have been in their current placements since 2007. By all accounts from the DHHR and the two current guardians ad litem, these children are doing better in their current placements than they ever have done, and they regress after any contact with Rosemary and/or Hiram. Thus, the circuit court's determinations should be affirmed.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the July 3, 2008, Dispositional Hearing Order by the Circuit Court of Mineral County is hereby affirmed. The termination of Rosemary's parental rights to the children is affirmed, and the denial of post-dispositional visitation also is affirmed.[21]

Affirmed.

Benjamin, Chief Justice, concurring:

I concur completely in the majority per curiam opinion of the Court. The July 3, 2008 Dispositional Hearing Order of the circuit court and the termination of rights and denial of post-dispositional visitation was proper. As I wrote earlier this year in my concurrence to the Court's decision in State ex rel. WVDHHR v. Pancake, 224 W.Va. 680 S.E.2d 54 (2009) (C.J.Benjamin, concurring): "Our guiding principle in cases such as this is the health and welfare of the child. These cases deservedly receive the highest priority of the court system's attention – a priority which applies to government in general. In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991)."

I write separately to express my continuing frustration with the failures of the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") to comply in a timely manner with its legal mandate to help families and children in West Virginia. My concerns are shared by Justice Workman and, I believe, by others on this Court.[1] The harsh emotional tone adopted

[1] See, for example, Justice Workman's concurrence herein. Because I believe that Justice Workman's concurrence focuses too much on the employees and administrators of DHHR, rather than on more institutionalized systemic problems such as inadequate resources, I choose not to join her separate opinion. From my observation, the employees and administrators of DHHR not only have the desire to serve the families and children of West Virginia, but also do so to the best of their abilities. Theirs is a thankless task which is easy to criticize and which too frequently goes unnoticed and unrecognized for the good actually done. I likewise choose not to join in the raw emotionalism apparent in by Justice Workman in her concurrence, I believe, richly conveys the general frustration of many with DHHR's inability to meet its legal mandate – an inability which, I believe, will necessarily require this Court to resolve the issue if nothing is done.

In view of the continuing inability of the DHHR to meet its legal mandate to the children and families of West Virginia, I believe that this Court must soon consider the creation of a commission to ensure that all legal mandates are adequately met by the DHHR.

Justice Workman's concurrence. "[T]he effective judge . . . strives to persuade, and not to pontificate." Hon. Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Speaking in a Judicial Voice, 67 N.Y.U. L.Rev. 1185, 1186 (1992). A judge should speak in "a moderate and restrained" voice. Id. A separate opinion should never "generate more heat than light." Id., at 1194. While I choose not to join her separate opinion, it is apparent that Justice Workman not only shares my frustrations, but that her patience is close to being exhausted, if it isn't already exhausted.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS

Workman, Justice, concurring:

The majority's decision is well-written and certainly reaches the right result for these children. Unfortunately, the years that the DHHR permitted these children to live in neglectful and abusive circumstances will likely have a negative impact for the rest of their lives.

Despite at least eleven referrals to the DHHR that began in 2001, it was not until June 12, 2007, that the DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition against Rosemary and Hiram. The DHHR's 2007 petition did not occur until there were more than six years of very serious allegations of abuse and neglect, wherein children were removed from the home on four separate occasions beginning in 2003. Even then, as more fully discussed below, in its June 6, 2008, subsequent filing in the circuit court, prior to a June 19, 2008, dispositional hearing, and in spite of a mountain of disturbing evidence showing abuse and neglect toward these children, the DHHR recommended that these children be returned to Rosemary and Hiram. It is outrageous that seven children were left in despicable circumstances by the DHHR for more than six years and even then, that the DHHR still sought to place those children back in an unsafe environment.

It is important to review some of the underlying facts. As early as March 22, 2001, allegations arose that Rosemary did not have the proper medication for Brandon and, instead, was replacing it with sleeping medication. Again, on August 21, 2001, the DHHR was informed that Brandon's medication was not being filled and that it was interfering with his schoolwork. Next, on August 14, 2002, the DHHR received a referral alleging that another child, Kenny, was being emotionally abused. With regard to the allegations concerning Kenny, even though the DHHR substantiated those charges of abuse, a case was not opened and the DHHR did not pursue an abuse and neglect petition. Instead, the DHHR referred Rosemary and Hiram to Family Preservation for parenting skills.

Soon thereafter, on August 27, 2002, the DHHR received a referral alleging that there was an immediate risk to the safety of Brittany, due to a discovery that she was having suicidal thoughts and had run away from home. On that same day, the DHHR received another referral alleging physical abuse, questionable disciplinary techniques, inadequate housing, and unrealistic expectations. Just a few weeks later, on September 5, 2002, the DHHR substantiated allegations that Rosemary hit the children with cake turners, withheld food as punishment, and mentally abused the children by threatening to send them back to Baltimore, Maryland, if they were bad. In this instance, sending the children back to Baltimore meant giving six children back to their biological parents, who were described by the circuit court as current and "long-time Baltimore drug addicts."

As evidence of abuse and neglect against Rosemary and Hiram continued to accumulate, on January 29, 2003, Brittany was removed from Rosemary's home on a juvenile petition, and returned to the home on February 26, 2003. She was again removed from Rosemary's home on September 9, 2004, and remains in the custody of the DHHR. On March 11, 2004, Kenny was removed from Rosemary's home by a juvenile petition, and was returned to the home on June 24, 2005. On September 9, 2004, the DHHR received yet another referral alleging inadequate care and emotional abuse in Rosemary's home, while on September 6, 2005, the DHHR received a referral alleging that Rosemary was refusing to send Joshua to school. On December 18, 2006, the DHHR received a referral alleging that Hiram physically and mentally abused Kenny. Kenny was temporarily removed from the home due to a juvenile petition, and the DHHR substantiated the allegations of emotional abuse. Even after all of these events, the DHHR still failed to institute a petition for abuse and neglect at this point.

On January 5, 2007, another child, Brandon, was removed from Rosemary's home and placed with the Division of Juvenile Services. On May 16, 2007, the DHHR received yet another referral, this time alleging that physical and emotional abuse was occurring in Rosemary's home. The children disclosed to DHHR employees that Hiram's sister, Serephine, her son Travis, and Travis' girlfriend, Diane, had been living at Rosemary's home, and that Hiram, Travis, and Diane had all overdosed at the home on numerous occasions. The children reported that Rosemary would give Hiram, Travis, and Diane milk when they passed out, and would only call an ambulance if she could not awaken them. The children alleged that Serephine's children were all taken away due to her crack addiction, and that Serephine was incredibly mean to them calling them names like "slut" and "whore." During the investigation for this referral, another child, Tiffany, was discovered with self-inflicted cut marks on her arms. Despite the fact that the DHHR substantiated emotional abuse and drug abuse in the home, and even witnessed emotional and physical harm to a child, it did not file a petition for abuse and neglect until June 12, 2007.

In its June 12, 2007, petition, the DHHR stated that "the [DHHR] has recently learned that Hiram is a convicted felon" and had been found guilty of drug possession and illegal transportation of firearms. It further pointed out that Hiram's sister, Serephine, was awaiting trial on charges of driving while under the influence of drugs, and that she had a criminal background of larceny, stalking, domestic violence, obstruction, and telephone misuse. It was also reported that Serephine's son Travis, who was now living in Rosemary's home, had a criminal background consisting of arson, theft, destruction of property, obstruction, harm and injury, assault, verbal threats, and conspiracy.

The DHHR contended that remaining in the home would "further endanger the children" and that "[t]he parents have failed to benefit from previous intervention and services and the same dangerous behaviors continue to exist in the home." Thus, the DHHR stated that it "fears for their safety" and that there was "no alternative but the removal of the children from the home." Notwithstanding its earlier position, however, during a June 6, 2008, hearing before the circuit court, the DHHR had the audacity to recommend that four of the children be reunified with Rosemary and Hiram. It further recommended that a fifth child remain in the foster care system and become a ward of the state. It is important to explain that the only reason the DHHR did not recommend that the fifth child be returned to Rosemary, is that Rosemary and Hiram no longer wanted that child. Moreover, at the time of the DHHR's petition, the remaining two children had turned eighteen and were no longer under the circuit court's jurisdiction. Given the overwhelming evidence below, it is inconceivable that the DHHR could take a position that would have placed these children back in Rosemary's home.

In spite of the DHHR's misguided posture on placement of the children, following a June 19, 2008, dispositional hearing, the circuit court wisely disagreed with the DHHR and terminated Rosemary and Hiram's parental rights. The circuit court noted that this was one of the "most unusual procedural situations of any abuse and neglect case this judge has encountered in ten years on the bench." He pointed out that Rosemary, who was seventy-five-years-old at the time of her dispositional hearing, and her forty-seven-year-old son, Hiram, were never approved as a foster home in Maryland or West Virginia; yet, they had seven children living in their home who were instructed to call them "Mom and Dad," none of whom were related by either blood or marriage to Rosemary or Hiram. The circuit court states that there was never even a child protective service case regarding these children in Maryland, and that "[t]he various cases seemed to be handled in family court, if at all."

Incredibly, the biological parents' rights to six of the children were not even terminated until December 12, 2007, while the biological mother's rights to the seventh child are still pending in the lower court. These children were ages two to twelve when they came to West Virginia, but were ages nine to nineteen at the time of the first dispositional hearing in the circuit court. Even then, as previously discussed, the DHHR was willing to leave these children in the care of Rosemary and Hiram. Why were these children failed by West Virginia and Maryland year after year?

There were countless red flags that should have triggered swift and meaningful action by the DHHR toward these children as numerous acts of abuse and unhealthy living conditions in Rosemary's home were substantiated throughout the years. As the circuit court stated, "A deplorable pattern was revealed." The circuit court further explained that "[a]s soon as a child gets old enough to report abuse, Rosemary would file a juvenile petition to get rid of and punish the child. That child is then shunned by Rosemary and Hiram." Clearly, these children lived in deplorable physical and emotional circumstances. Nonetheless, even though it was reported that a goat and a lamb were living inside the house, and that the house had a significant cockroach and flea infestation problem, in addition to the myriad reports of emotional and physical abuse, the DHHR found no reason to take action during those time periods.

Rosemary and Hiram's treatment of Patricia is also troubling. As the circuit court explained, "One of the best examples of how the DHHR, Guardian ad Litem and other MDT [Multidisciplinary team] members have overlooked the obvious is the cruel and completely unnecessary treatment of Patricia because she has Hepatitis C." It is believed that Patricia contracted Hepatitis C as an infant when her biological mother stabbed her with a dirty needle used for drug abuse. Throughout her time in Rosemary's home, Patricia was not allowed to use the family bathroom and was forced to use a bucket for a toilet that was located in a trailer outside of the home and without working plumbing. As the circuit court explained, "she was ostracized from the family at mealtime and in other ways [and she] was told she would die before she was sixteen." Rosemary and Hiram treated Patricia in this despicable manner in spite of well-documented evidence in the record that they had received specific and detailed medical advice to the contrary from numerous individuals. Earlier involvement by the DHHR could have prevented this situation altogether.

It is frustrating that it was not until this appeal, and after the circuit court terminated the parental rights of Rosemary and Hiram in 2008, that the DHHR finally took the position that the children remain in their current placements and that visitation with Rosemary occur only at the discretion of the individual children. The DHHR is about eight years late. Where was the DHHR as continued abuse and neglect occurred with child after child, year after year?

In consideration of all of the above, as well as the countless other cases throughout the years regarding the DHHR's responsibilities toward the children of this State, we face an epidemic in child protective services in West Virginia that will necessarily affect future generations as they almost always re-appear within the court system battered, bruised, and often broken; or as abusers in their adult families; and often as criminals. It is clear that most child protective service workers in West Virginia are dedicated and conscientious, but also overworked, and underpaid. This concurring opinion is in no way intended to denigrate their work. Instead, the intent is to issue a clarion call to the DHHR to provide child protective services with more resources and more direction in protecting children as provided in an extensive body of both statutory and case law.

It is also important to note that from the earliest time these children came to the DHHR's attention, some inquiry should have been made as to their legal status. The record reflects that Rosemary and Hiram had only a legal guardianship of the children executed by the children's biological parents and endorsed by a Maryland court. Once these children fell in West Virginia's jurisdiction by virtue of the earliest abuse and neglect allegations, the DHHR should have begun an ongoing inquiry into the legal status of the children. Case law has made clear that every child is entitled to permanency to the greatest extent the legal system can ensure it. See State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996); In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); In re Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); In re Lindsey C., 196 W.Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995) (Workman, J., dissenting); In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). The DHHR should have acted very early to begin concurrent planning,[1] more effective intervention, and permanency in the children's lives–permanency in "the level of custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline that is consistent with . . . [a] child's best interests." State v. Michael M., 202 W.Va. 350, 358, 504 S.E.2d 177, 185 (1998). This Court observed in Amy M., supra, that a child deserves "resolution and permanency" in his or her life and deserves the right to rely on his or her caretakers "to be there to provide the basic nurturance of life." 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. Moreover, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted).

This Court has consistently held that abuse and neglect cases must be given the highest priority to ensure their prompt resolution in order to provide permanency for the children involved therein. See Syllabus Point 1, In re Carlita B., supra. It is a child's natural right to have proper care, adequate nutrition, shelter, and nurturance; and to not be neglected, abused, or forced to live in a substandard, scarring environment. But in too many cases in this Court, we see children who are denied permanency by being left in legal limbo for long periods of time during their formative years. This phenomenon not only causes concern that this may be the tip of the iceberg, but engenders the question as to whether we must begin to reexamine child protective services in a more systemic manner.

This should be the practice in all abuse and neglect cases, so that there is a permanency plan for children where family reconciliation efforts are not successful for whatever reason").

Therefore, for the reasons set forth above, I respectfully concur with the majority opinion.

JUSTICE KETCHUM delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Before the prosecution of a lawsuit may be barred on the basis of res judicata, three elements must be satisfied. First, there must have been a final adjudication on the merits in the prior action by a court having jurisdiction of the proceedings. Second, the two actions must involve either the same parties or persons in privity with those same parties. Third, the cause of action identified for resolution in the subsequent proceeding either must be identical to the cause of action determined in the prior action or must be such that it could have been resolved, had it been presented, in the prior action." Syllabus Point 4, Blake v. Charleston Area Med. Ctr., Inc., 201 W.Va. 469, 498 S.E.2d 41 (1997).

2. "Collateral estoppel will bar a claim if four conditions are met: (1) The issue previously decided is identical to the one presented in the action in question; (2) there is a final adjudication on the merits of the prior action; (3) the party against whom the doctrine is invoked was a party or in privity with a party to a prior action; and (4) the party against whom the doctrine is raised had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the prior action." Syllabus Point 1, State v. Miller, 194 W.Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114 (1995).

3. "Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." Syllabus Point 5, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

4. Under W.Va. Code § 48-27-305 [2001], a petition for a domestic violence protective order may be pursued by three classes of people: (1) a person individually seeking relief from domestic violence; (2) an adult person seeking relief from domestic violence on behalf of a family or household member, such as a minor child; or (3) a person who is being abused, threatened or harassed because they witnessed or reported domestic violence.

5. While a civil abuse and neglect action pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 [2005] may be initiated by either the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources or "a reputable person," the action is pursued solely on behalf of the State of West Virginia in its role as parens patriae.

6. A petition for a domestic violence protective order under W.Va. Code § 48-27-101, et seq., and a petition alleging abuse and/or neglect under W.Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq., may be filed upon the same facts without consequences under the doctrine of res judicata or the doctrine of collateral estoppel.

Justice Ketchum:

In this appeal from the Circuit Court of Ohio County, the parties dispute a circuit court order dismissing a petition which alleged that a parent abused and/or neglected a child. We are asked to determine whether one parent may seek a domestic violence protective order against the other parent of the child, and then later file a petition to initiate an abuse and neglect proceeding for the child in circuit court regarding the same conduct. In its order dismissing the petition, the circuit court concluded that an abuse and neglect proceeding filed after the conclusion of a domestic violence proceeding would be barred by principles of res judicata and collateral estoppel.

As set forth below, we reverse the circuit court's order. We find that even if a civil domestic violence proceeding and a civil abuse and neglect proceeding involve the same underlying facts, the separate proceedings do not implicate the doctrines of res judicata or collateral estoppel.

I.
FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

This case presents issues involving the overlapping jurisdictions of the magistrate, family, and circuit courts of Ohio County, West Virginia. The underlying facts are simple. K.S. and K.C. are the biological parents of B.C., a minor child. K.S. ("the mother") and K.C. ("the father") divorced in 2004. The mother now alleges that the father has been neglectful and physically violent toward B.C.

In December 2011, the mother filed a domestic violence petition in magistrate court on behalf of B.C. She alleged several incidents of abuse and neglect by the father against B.C.[1] Based upon the abuse allegations, a magistrate granted an emergency protective order for B.C., and then scheduled a final hearing on the petition before a family court judge. Following the hearing, the family court judge dismissed the mother's domestic violence petition, in part because he did not find the testimony of B.C. to be credible. On March 9, 2012, the circuit court affirmed the family court's dismissal.

On March 12, 2012, the mother filed an abuse and neglect petition in the circuit court. The mother asked the circuit court to terminate the father's parental rights

[1] In addition to citing several specific examples of violence by the father against the child, the December 2011 domestic violence petition vaguely alleged that the father had substance abuse problems that led him to neglect the child. We note that a court may not issue a domestic violence protective order based solely upon allegations of neglect, unless those allegations meet one of the five categories of "domestic violence" or "abuse" that are defined in W.Va. Code § 48-27-202 [2010]:

> (1) Attempting to cause or intentionally, knowingly or recklessly causing physical harm to another with or without dangerous or deadly weapons;
>
> (2) Placing another in reasonable apprehension of physical harm;
>
> (3) Creating fear of physical harm by harassment, stalking, psychological abuse or threatening acts;
>
> (4) Committing either sexual assault or sexual abuse as those terms are defined in articles eight-b and eight-d, chapter sixty-one of this code; and
> (5) Holding, confining, detaining or abducting another person against that person's will.

based upon allegations of abuse and neglect. The circuit court later noted that the allegations were "essentially the same allegations that were made" in the December 2011 domestic violence petition.

After filing the abuse and neglect petition, the mother alleges that an additional incident of domestic violence was committed by the father against B.C. That incident occurred on May 5, 2012, when the mother took B.C. to the Wheeling Police Department to exchange him with the father as required by the parties' shared parenting agreement. Apparently, the father grabbed the child and forcefully tried to take him, and in so doing twisted and fractured the child's wrist. This incident was recorded by video cameras.

On May 7th, the mother filed a new domestic violence petition on B.C.'s behalf against the father. The family court granted the petition and entered an emergency protective order in favor of B.C. The family court found clear and convincing evidence that B.C. "sustained a fractured wrist at the hands of [the father] . . . The same would constitute an act of domestic violence[.]"

On May 9th, the prosecutor filed a criminal complaint against the father charging him with misdemeanor domestic battery for the fracturing of B.C.'s wrist.[2] However, the prosecutor later agreed to a "pretrial diversion" with the father.[3] The prosecutor indicated that he would stay prosecution of the complaint for six months, and that if the father complied with certain court orders during that time, the prosecutor would dismiss the domestic battery charge.

[2] See W.Va. Code § 61-2-28(a) [2011].

[3] The prosecutor and K.C. reached this agreement on February 25, 2013.

Several days later, on May 14th, the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") made a motion to intervene in the abuse and neglect action still pending in circuit court. DHHR said it wanted to intervene "to provide supportive services to the infant" and "to remedy any circumstances which may be detrimental to the child[.]"

Finally, on June 7th, the mother filed an amended abuse and neglect petition in the circuit court. In this newest petition, the mother added the allegations of domestic violence that the father allegedly committed against B.C. at the police department on May 5, 2012.

Counsel for the father filed a motion to dismiss the original and amended abuse and neglect petitions. The father asserted that the abuse and neglect allegations were the same as the allegations in the domestic violence petition filed in December 2011. Because the family court and circuit court had issued final orders adjudicating the mother's domestic violence allegations and denying the mother any relief, the father argued that the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel supported dismissal of the abuse and neglect action.

In an order dated March 18, 2013, the circuit court agreed and dismissed the mother's abuse and neglect petitions. Finding that the allegations in both the original and amended abuse and neglect petitions were "essentially the same" as those made in the December 2011 domestic violence petition, the circuit court determined that the abuse and neglect petitions were barred by the doctrine of res judicata. Further, the circuit court found the doctrine of collateral estoppel barred the abuse and neglect petitions because the issues of abuse dispensed with in the domestic violence petition and in the misdemeanor criminal complaint "are factually identical to the issues raised in this action." The circuit court accepted the father's assertion that his ex-wife (the mother) was simply attempting "to relitigate the domestic violence allegations that a Family Court has addressed and dismissed and the criminal charges that the State intends to dismiss."

Counsel for the mother now appeals the circuit court's dismissal order.

III.
ANALYSIS

The circuit court dismissed the mother's original and amended abuse and neglect petitions under the doctrine of res judicata and the doctrine of collateral estoppel. Both doctrines can be invoked to halt the prosecution of a lawsuit, or of a claim within a lawsuit, when the claim has been resolved on the merits in a prior proceeding. We find that the circuit court erred in applying these doctrines.

In Blake v. Charleston Area Med. Ctr., Inc., 201 W.Va. 469, 498 S.E.2d 41 (1997), we set forth a three-part test for determining if a lawsuit was barred by res judicata. Syllabus Point 4 of Blake states:

> Before the prosecution of a lawsuit may be barred on the basis of res judicata, three elements must be satisfied. First, there must have been a final adjudication on the merits in the prior action by a court having jurisdiction of the proceedings. Second, the two actions must involve either the same parties or persons in privity with those same parties. Third, the cause of action identified for resolution in the subsequent proceeding either must be identical to the cause of action determined in the prior action or must be such that it could have been resolved, had it been presented, in the prior action. (Emphasis added).

In State v. Miller, 194 W.Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114 (1995), we outlined a four-part test to determine if a party was collaterally estopped from raising a previously resolved question in a new civil action. We stated in Syllabus Point 1 of Miller:

> Collateral estoppel will bar a claim if four conditions are met: (1) The issue previously decided is identical to the one presented in the action in question; (2) there is a final adjudication on the merits of the prior action; (3) the party against whom the doctrine is invoked was a party or in privity with a party to a prior action; and (4) the party against whom the doctrine is raised had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the prior action.

As we discuss below, the circuit court misapplied both of these doctrines. Generally speaking, two of the key elements to invoking these doctrines are that (1) the party in the current lawsuit, against whom either doctrine is being invoked, must be same as the party in the prior proceeding, and (2) the claims in both suits must essentially be identical. Neither of these elements was satisfied in the instant appeal. As a matter of law, petitions for domestic violence protective orders involve different parties from civil abuse and/or neglect actions. Further, in the instant case, the mother's abuse and neglect petitions raised claims substantially different from those adjudicated in the December 2011 domestic violence petition.

A. Identical Parties

The doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel prevent parties from relitigating in a new action a claim or issue that was definitively settled by a prior judicial decision. The doctrine of res judicata essentially requires that the prior and current actions must involve the same parties;[4] the doctrine of collateral estoppel only requires the party against whom the doctrine is invoked to have been a party[5] to the prior action.

In this case, the circuit court presumed that B.C.'s mother was the same party who pursued both the December 2011 domestic violence petition and the March and June 2012 abuse and neglect petitions.[6] The circuit court concluded that because the mother was the same party asserting "essentially the same" allegations in both these [4] In the rare alternative, individuals in "privity" with the parties may be barred from pursuing an action based upon res judicata.

[5] In the rare alternative, an individual in "privity" with a party may be barred from pursuing a claim in a later action because of collateral estoppel.

[6] As we discuss later, the circuit court also seems – incorrectly – to have presumed that the same parties and allegations raised in the abuse and neglect petition were also involved in the criminal action against K.C., and that the resolution of the criminal action also resolved the allegations of abuse and neglect.

actions, she could not pursue her abuse and neglect petition. We reject this conclusion by the circuit court because the parties to a civil domestic violence proceeding are inherently different from those in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding.

A domestic violence proceeding is brought "[t]o assure victims of domestic violence the maximum protection from abuse that the law can provide," and to "create a speedy remedy to discourage violence against family or household members[.]" W.Va. Code § 48-27-101 (b)(1) and (2) [2001]. Our domestic violence prevention statutes identify three "persons" who may seek protection, for themselves or others, by filing a petition for a protective order. W.Va. Code § 48-27-305 [2001] states:

> A petition for a protective order may be filed by:
> (1) A person seeking relief under this article for herself or himself;
>
> (2) An adult family or household member for the protection of the victim or for any family or household member who is a minor child or physically or mentally incapacitated to the extent that he or she cannot file on his or her own behalf, or
> (3) A person who reported or was a witness to domestic violence and who, as a result, has been abused, threatened, harassed or who has been the subject of other actions intended to intimidate the person.

Specifically, the Legislature has established that the party in interest who pursues a petition for a domestic violence protective order is a "person."

A civil abuse and neglect proceeding is substantially different from a proceeding for a domestic violence protective order. West Virginia's abuse and neglect statutes "establish a mechanism whereby the courts may adjudicate questions arising when the State or a citizen thereof believes there is necessity to change the custodial relationship of natural parent and child because of some dereliction on the part of the parent[.]" In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 238, 207 S.E.2d 129, 137 (1973). West Virginia's abuse and neglect statues indicate that a petition may be filed by two entities: either the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") or "a reputable person." W.Va. Code § 49-6-1[2005] states, in part:

> (a) If the department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court. . . . The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. . . .
> (b) The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian . . . Notice shall also be given to the department, any foster or preadoptive parent, and any relative providing care for the child. . . .
> (c) At the time of the institution of any proceeding under this article, the department shall provide supportive services in an effort to remedy circumstances detrimental to a child.

Our abuse and neglect statutes certainly permit "a reputable person" to initiate a petition for relief. "By permitting an individual who believes that abuse and/or neglect is occurring, or has occurred, to file a petition alleging such circumstances, and by requiring this person to also have sufficient knowledge of the facts underlying this belief to verify the petition, the statutory framework attempts to protect parents, custodians, guardians, and care givers from unsubstantiated charges while permitting the filing of petitions seeking to protect the health, safety, and well-being of children." State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W.Va. 248, 256, 496 S.E.2d 198, 206 (1997).

However, while "a reputable person" may initiate an abuse and neglect action under W.Va. Code § 49-6-1, it does not mean that the reputable person has any stake in the action or that the action is being pursued on behalf of the reputable person as the party in interest. Instead, our cases make clear that an abuse and neglect action is prosecuted on behalf of one party, and only one party: the State of West Virginia, in its role as parens patriae.

The doctrine of parens patriae allows the State "in its capacity as provider of protection to those unable to care for themselves" to prosecute a suit "on behalf of someone who is under a legal disability." Black's Law Dictionary 1221 (9th Ed. 2009). The State, in its role of parens patriae, "[s]tand[s] at the side of the natural parents with benign, but continuing, interest" in the care and custody of children. In re Willis, 157 W.Va. at 238, 207 S.E.2d at 137. The Legislature first adopted our abuse, neglect and child welfare statutes in 1915 as a way to "afford special protection to persons of tender years," and crafted those statutes as "an obvious expression of our lawmakers to join the then modern sociological trend by the codification of the doctrine of parens patriae." State ex rel. Slatton v. Boles, 147 W.Va. 674, 679, 130 S.E.2d 192, 196 (1963). As Justice Miller observed:

> While parents enjoy an inherent right to the care and custody of their own children, the State in its recognized role of parens patriae is the ultimate protector of the rights of minors. The State has a substantial interest in providing for their health, safety, and welfare, and may properly step in to do so when necessary. . . . . In cases of suspected abuse or neglect, the State has a clear interest in protecting the child and may, if necessary, separate abusive or neglectful parents from their children.

In the Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 608, 371 S.E.2d 326, 329 (1988). Hence, as we said in Syllabus Point 5 of In re Willis, supra:

> Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care.

While a civil abuse and neglect action is pursued solely under the State's parens patriae authority, "the legislature has made DHHR the State's representative." Syllabus Point 4, in part, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997). "DHHR is the client of county prosecutors," and "prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions." Id. And it is the circuit court that has exclusive "jurisdiction to entertain an abuse and neglect petition and to conduct proceedings in accordance therewith[.]" Syllabus Point 3, State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W.Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198 (1997).

To summarize, under W.Va. Code § 48-27-305, a petition for a domestic violence protective order may be prosecuted by three classes of people: (1) a person individually seeking relief from domestic violence; (2) an adult person seeking relief from domestic violence on behalf of a family or household member, such as a minor child; or (3) a person who is being abused, threatened or harassed because they witnessed or reported domestic violence. However, while a civil abuse and neglect action pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 may be initiated by either the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources or "a reputable person," the action is prosecuted solely on behalf of the State of West Virginia in its role as parens patriae.

Comparing these statutory schemes, it is clear that the party in interest in a domestic violence action is, as a matter of law, different from the party in interest in an abuse and neglect action. Accordingly, we hold that a petition for a domestic violence protective order under W.Va. Code § 48-27-101, et seq., and a petition alleging abuse and/or neglect under W.Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq., may be filed upon the same facts without consequences under the doctrine of res judicata or the doctrine of collateral estoppel.

Applied to the instant case, it is obvious that the circuit court erred in dismissing the mother's petitions alleging abuse and neglect under the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel. The mother unsuccessfully pursued her December 2011 petition for a domestic violence protective order on behalf of her son, B.C. However, when she alleged these same acts of domestic violence in her March 2012 abuse and neglect petition, she did so only as "a reputable person."[7] Upon the filing of the abuse

[7] Before the circuit court, counsel for the father argued that the mother was not a "reputable person" under W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 "because she is, in part, forum shopping" and "is clearly showing a level of bias and animosity that the Legislature could not have meant" when enacting the abuse and neglect statutes. In its order, the circuit court declined to address this argument by the father.

and neglect petition, it was the State of West Virginia who became the prosecuting party in interest. The DHHR, as the agent for the State, was then charged with investigating the allegations and pursuing the best course to assure the "care, safety and guidance," and the "mental and physical welfare," of the minor child. W.Va. Code § 49-1-1(a)(1) and (2). Put simply, the mother was neither the same party nor was she in privity with the parties in both the December 2011 domestic violence action and the March 2012 abuse and neglect action. The circuit court erred in holding otherwise.

B. Identical question

The doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel bar the relitigation of a claim or issue previously resolved in another suit. Res judicata (also called "claim preclusion") generally applies if "the cause of action identified for resolution in the subsequent proceeding" is "identical to the cause of action determined in the prior action," or could have been raised and determined in the prior action. Syllabus Point 4, Blake, supra. Collateral estoppel (also called "issue preclusion") applies if the "issue previously decided is identical to the one presented in the action in question." Syllabus

---

A "reputable person" under W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 is simply a person who "believes that abuse and/or neglect is occurring, or has occurred," and who has "sufficient knowledge of the facts underlying this belief to verify the petition." State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W.Va. at 256, 496 S.E.2d at 206. In Paul B., we approved of an abuse and neglect petition filed by respite caregivers whose belief about the existence of abuse and/or neglect was based upon "personal familiarity with and observations of the children during their provision of respite care[.]" 201 W.Va. at 257, 496 S.E.2d at 207. On the appendix record presented to this Court, it appears that the mother meets these standards to qualify as a "reputable person."

Point 1, Miller, supra. An "issue" is "any right, fact or legal matter which is put in issue[.]" Miller, 194 W.Va. at 9, 459 S.E.2d at 120. In the instant case, the circuit court ruled that the causes of action and issues in both the December 2011 domestic violence petition and the March and June 2012 abuse and neglect petitions were identical "because the same evidence supports each of these separate and various causes of action [and issues]."

The circuit court's ruling was clearly in error, because the court failed to consider that the claims and issues that can be raised before, and the relief that could be granted by, the circuit court in an abuse and neglect action are substantially different and broader than the claims, issues and relief that can be considered by the magistrate and family courts in a proceeding for a domestic violence protective order. A domestic violence action is intended solely as a short-term, temporary response to prevent domestic violence; an abuse and neglect action is designed to craft long-term solutions to both violence and neglect in the household. While the circuit courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the family and magistrate courts over domestic violence proceedings, only circuit courts have jurisdiction to preside over abuse and neglect actions. Compare W.Va. Code § 48-27-301(a) [2012] ("Circuit courts, family courts and magistrate courts, have concurrent jurisdiction over domestic violence proceedings"); W.Va. Code 49-6-1(a) (if a child is neglected or abused, "the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court").

To state it succinctly, many of the long-term, comprehensive remedies that a circuit court can order in an abuse and neglect case are simply not available in a domestic violence action. We perceive that, in many instances, the same factual scenario of domestic abuse and/or neglect could support not only a civil abuse and/or neglect action and an action for a domestic violence protective order, but could also simultaneously support a criminal prosecution, a civil tort action for damages, and an action in family court for divorce or allocation of parental responsibility. Each of these actions involves different parties, different causes of action, different burdens of proof, and/or different forms of relief not available in one court or another.

Additionally, the circuit court failed to make any reference to the mother's amended abuse and neglect petition, which raised allegations of violence against the child that happened in May 2012. Counsel for the mother plainly expressed to the circuit court that new, unresolved, unadjudicated facts supported the petition. The new issues raised in the amended petition occurred five months after the events detailed in the December 2011 domestic violence action, and therefore could not have been identical to the previously adjudicated questions. Yet the circuit court still went on find the issues raised by the amended petition were "essentially the same" as those in the domestic violence action, and dismissed the amended petition as barred by the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel.

Finally, we are troubled by one additional conclusion by the circuit court. The mother was not a party to the criminal action filed in magistrate court. The criminal case was initiated by the prosecutor, and it was the prosecutor who entered into a bargain with the father. Still, counsel for the father argued that the abuse and neglect petition was "simply another attempt" by the mother "to re-litigate the domestic violence . . . criminal charges that the State intends to dismiss." The circuit court accepted this argument, and found that the mother "had a full and fair opportunity to litigate all of the issues" in the criminal proceeding in magistrate court. The circuit court concluded that the mother's abuse and neglect assertions were collaterally estopped, in part, because they were "issues of (domestic) abuse . . . dispensed with by the State in the criminal action[.]"

This conclusion by the circuit court was in error. This Court has determined that civil abuse and neglect proceedings are to be treated as separate and apart from criminal proceedings arising from child abuse or neglect. As we stated in Syllabus Point 2 of Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997),

> A civil child abuse and neglect petition instituted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources pursuant to Code, 49–6–1 et seq., is not subject to dismissal pursuant to the terms of a plea bargain between a county prosecutor and a criminal defendant in a related child abuse prosecution.

This is because "civil abuse and neglect proceedings focus directly upon the safety and well-being of the child and are not simply 'companion cases' to criminal prosecutions." 201 W.Va. at 66, 491 S.E.2d at 613. The circuit court erred when it found that the allegations in the abuse and neglect petition were collaterally estopped by the prosecutor's choice to dismiss the criminal charges against the father.

In sum, because the claims and issues resolved in the December 2011 domestic violence proceeding were different from those in the original and amended abuse and neglect petitions, the circuit court erred in finding the mother's abuse and neglect action was precluded by the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel.

IV.
CONCLUSION

The circuit court erred in finding that the original and amended abuse and neglect petitions were barred by the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel. Accordingly, the circuit court's March 18, 2013, order must be reversed.

Reversed and remanded.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' LOUGHRY, Justice:

The petitioner, Krista H. ("the mother"), appeals from the January 9, 2014, Corrected Disposition Order through which the Circuit Court of Wood County granted primary custodial responsibility of her daughters, B.H. and S.S.,[1] to their biological father, the respondent Randy H., Jr. ("the father");[2] granted her unsupervised visitation with the children; and dismissed the proceeding from the circuit court's docket.[3] Seeking a reversal of the circuit court's order and the entry of a new order making her the primary custodial parent, the mother asserts that the circuit court erred by granting the father primary custody of the children because she had substantially complied with the terms and conditions of her

[2]The record reflects that the Randy H. is the biological father of both S.S. and B.H. There is some indication in the appendix record that the mother and father were married and later divorced, although the Court could not find a specific date in the record for either event.

[3]On April 5, 2013, the mother filed her notice of appeal from the circuit court's first Disposition Order entered March 6, 2013, that terminated her custodial rights to B.H. and S.S. and gave primary custody of the children to their father. This order also gave the mother liberal visitation with her daughters pursuant to the Multi-Disciplinary Team's proposed Parenting Plan, which the circuit court adopted. Under Rule 50 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, "[t]he filing of a petition for appeal does not operate to automatically stay the proceedings or orders of the circuit court in abuse, neglect, and/or termination of parental rights cases . . . ." The circuit court's docket sheet reflects that no stay was entered in this matter and, during the pendency of this appeal, the circuit court entered its Corrected Disposition Order.

improvement period and by denying her an adequate opportunity to regain primary physical custody of the children through unsupervised visitation. Based upon the record, the parties' briefs, and the arguments presented, we find no error. Accordingly, we affirm the circuit court's award of primary custody of the children to the father and unsupervised visitation to the mother.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

On December 5, 2011, the respondent, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("the Department"), filed a verified Petition to Institute Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings ("Petition") against the mother in relation to her minor children, B.H. and S.S.[4] The father was also a named respondent in the proceeding, although there were no allegations of either abuse or neglect against him in the Petition.[5] The Department alleged that the mother was in a personal relationship with a registered sex offender, John

[4]B.H. was born in 2004, and S.S. was born in 2001. The children were initially placed in foster care, then with their paternal grandparents, and ultimately with their father, as more fully discussed infra. Although the mother's oldest child was also named in the Department's Petition, he reached the age of majority during the pendency of the proceeding and was no longer a party at the time of disposition.

[5]After the father was served with the Petition, he sought custody of his children as the non-offending parent. The father admittedly had no contact with his children for an extended period of time. During a hearing before the circuit court, the father acknowledged that he had previously attempted to voluntarily relinquish his parental rights to B.H. and S.S., an action that he attributed to the mother's interference with his attempts to have contact with his children, as well as her transient lifestyle, both of which prevented him from maintaining contact with his children.

Bailey; that the mother exposed her children to Mr. Bailey, as well as his friend, Andrew Oldaker, a registered sex offender with whom the mother, her daughters, B.H. and S.S., and Mr. Bailey lived for a period of time; and that S.S. and B.H. were sexually abused on multiple occasions by Mr. Bailey and other sex offenders with whom the mother associated.[6] The Department took emergency custody of the children and, on December 6, 2011, the circuit court ordered that the legal and physical custody of B.H. and S.S. remain with the Department. The mother waived her preliminary hearing and the matter proceeded to adjudication.

During the January 10, 2012, adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court accepted the mother's stipulation wherein she stated, in part, as follows:

> 3. The father of [B.H. and S.S.] is Randy [H., Jr.] whose whereabouts are unknown.
> • • • •
> 7. The respondent-mother admits to the neglect of the above-named children as follows:
>
> 1. No permanent residence at the time of filing the petition.

---

[6]The following is an example of the abuse alleged in the Department's Petition:

> On or around December 1, 2011, [S.S.] stated that John took her the night before and threw her on the bed then ripped . . . her pants off and stuck his fingers in her spot and pointed at her vaginal area. She stated that he also made her rub his chest. [S.S.] stated that it never stops. She stated that sometimes she does not mind it because if she does things with him he buys her really cool stuff.

> 2. She and her children were residing with John Bailey, a registered sex offender.
> 3. She was aware that John Bailey and Andrew Oldaker were registered sex offenders, and failed to protect her children by allowing them to be around John Bailey and Andrew Oldaker.
> 4. That as a result of being around John Bailey and other individuals who are registered sex offenders, her children were subjected to sexual abuse.
> 8. Based upon these stipulations, the children are neglected children within the meaning of the West Virginia Code 49-6-1 et al.

On January 17, 2012, the circuit court entered an order adjudicating the children abused and neglected and awarding the mother a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. The primary goals of the improvement period were to aid the mother in improving her self-esteem; to help her gain insight into how her children had been harmed through their exposure to registered sex offenders; and to teach her how to identify and recognize sex offenders, how to prevent the sexual abuse of her children, and how to provide them with a safe and secure home, free from exposure to sex offenders. The improvement period also allowed the mother to have supervised visitation with her daughters.

Thereafter, periodic review hearings were held before the circuit court to ascertain how the mother was doing in her improvement period. While the mother complied with certain aspects of her improvement period, in other areas she experienced difficulties.[7] In Child Protective Services ("CPS") worker Amanda Damron's April 3, 2012, hearing update, she reported that the mother had knowingly started dating and living with another sex offender, Patrick Trembly. CPS worker Damron further reported that the mother indicated that Mr. Trembly was fighting his "wrongful conviction" and that she believed he is innocent.[8]

In CPS worker Damron's update for the July 9, 2012, review hearing, she reported that the mother "seemed to understand what the appropriate boundaries should be with [B.H. and S.S.], but in the next visit, she did nothing that she and the worker [the [7]The concerns reported by the service provider and the child protective services worker included the mother's difficulty in understanding the safety concerns that arise when she allows S.S. to use her cell phone to access Facebook in her effort to find "dates" for her mother; the mother being "very untruthful at times[;]" the mother's inability to see the mistakes that she continues to make with the children despite her ability to verbalize her past mistakes; and the mother not retaining the information discussed at her parenting classes.

[8]Although Ms. Damron indicated in her May, 23, 2012, hearing update that there had been no further reports of the mother being in a relationship with a sex offender at that time, the appendix record contains the mother's testimony that she lived with Mr. Trembly until June 2012 and that she "broke it off" with him after learning that he was a registered sex offender, although she still agreed "to help him go over his papers[,]" "as a friend." When questioned regarding her claim that she had learned from her mistake with John Bailey given her relationship with Mr. Trembly, the mother responded that "[she] learned not to have [registered sex offenders] around my kids[]" and Mr. Trembly "wasn't around my children because they were with CPS." Admittedly, the mother did not have custody of her children due to her relationships with registered sex offenders, which led to the sexual abuse of her daughters.

parenting provider] talked about." Ms. Damron further reported that the parenting provider was "very uneasy at the thought of unsupervised visitation."

In late August 2012, the mother filed a motion for a ninety-day extension of her improvement period, which the circuit court granted. Approximately one month into the ninety-day extension, CPS worker Damron reported that the mother had started weekend visitations with her children under the supervision of her maternal aunt. Ms. Damron concluded her October 2012 report by expressing continuing concern that the mother will not be protective of the children based on the parenting provider's impression that the mother still does not believe that John Bailey is a sex offender[9] but says that she does so as to appear protective.[10] In late November 2012, CPS worker Damron filed another hearing update in

[9]During the disposition hearing, the mother testified that she knew John Bailey was a pedophile when she was dating him but did not believe that he was because she was told that his victim "was 16 and he was only a couple years older, and that, to me, does not make you a pedophile." The mother further testified that she ended her relationship with John Bailey, not because he was a registered sex offender and a pedophile, but because she "didn't approve of the way he was yelling at [her children]."

[10]This October 2012 report also reflects that the parenting provider questioned the mother about "Jerry," a friend of John Bailey and a registered sex offender whom S.S. said had sexually abused her. The appendix record reflects that "Jerry" shared one bed in a hotel room with B.H. and S.S. while the mother and John Bailey shared the other bed. The mother told the provider that she did not know that "Jerry" was a registered sex offender at the time. When the provider asked the mother why it would be appropriate for her to allow her daughters to be in a bed with a grown male, regardless of whether she knew that person was a registered sex offender, the mother responded that she has no "common sense" and does not "think of those types of things[.]" which she reported that while the mother had complied with the terms and conditions of all services,[11] she "continue[d] to be concerned that [the mother] will not be protective of the children in the future" and that "the provider's account of [the mother's] diminished decision making skills . . . will cause safety concerns for the children if they were to be in [the mother's] complete care."[12] In recognition of these continuing concerns, when the circuit court awarded the mother unsupervised visitation by order entered December 10, 2012, the court directed that only the mother and the children's maternal grandmother[13] could be present and that "the [Department], provider or the Guardian ad Litem shall follow-up immediately after the visitations to make sure they are appropriate."

[11]The appendix record reflects that the terms and conditions of the mother's improvement period included her participating in parenting classes, adult life skills classes, and a domestic violence group to teach her independence and the ability to build healthy relationships that do not put her children at risk; participating in group and individual therapy geared toward improving her self-esteem; complying with her psychiatric treatment; attending the children's therapy appointments; maintaining a safe and stable household for her children; and participating in the supervised visitation with her children.

[12]In her November 2012 update, Ms. Damron also reported on a recent Multi-Disciplinary Team meeting during which the parenting provider advised that the mother would have "difficulty recognizing safety concerns early enough to prevent the children being harmed in the future[;]" and that unsupervised visits, if any, should be solely between the mother and the children given the mother's difficulty in choosing appropriate people with whom to associate.

[13]During the course of this proceeding, the mother moved into the basement apartment of her mother's home. Counsel advised the Court during oral argument that the mother continues to reside in this apartment.

In CPS worker Damron's final report to the circuit court, she advised that the mother's unsupervised visitations began the prior month in the basement apartment of her mother's home where she was residing, and that the visitations went well. Ms. Damron further advised that while the mother had complied with services, the Multi-Disciplinary Team ("MDT") members continued to be concerned that she had "not changed her behavior enough to ensure that she will not expose her children to inappropriate people." Ms. Damron concluded her report by stating that all MDT members, except the mother, agreed that the best interests of the children would be served by allowing them to remain in the primary custody of their father with a visitation plan for the mother.

On February 5, 2013, the disposition hearing was held during which Ms. Damron testified consistently with her final report, as discussed above. The mother testified that she now understands that it is important to keep her children away from certain kinds of people; that she was attracted to these people because they "paid attention" to her; that she learned how to determine "whether these guys are on the sex offender list[;]" that her self-esteem had improved; and that she "blame[d]" Parkersburg, West Virginia,[14] for her relationships with three different sex offenders. The father testified that the children had been living with him, his wife, and his other daughter for approximately four months; that their school attendance had been excellent; that both girls were on the honor roll at school; and that both girls feel safe and know that they have a stable home.

At the conclusion of the disposition hearing, the Department's counsel advised that the children's best interest would be served by terminating the mother's custodial rights and allowing the children to remain with their father while giving the mother visitation. The GAL concluded that it was in the children's best interest to remain with their father with frequent and liberal visitation with their mother.[15]

On March 13, 2013, the circuit court entered its first Disposition Order in which it terminated the mother's custodial rights[16] and adopted the Parenting Plan proposed by the MDT, which made the father the primary residential parent and gave the mother

[15]The GAL also expressed concern to the circuit court regarding the mother's relationship with Patrick Trembly and her "lack of insight into these issues[,]" including that she blamed Parkersburg, West Virginia, for her association with sex offenders. As the GAL observed, "I think it's the mother's choices and where she puts herself and where she ends up." While acknowledging that the mother had completed her improvement period, the GAL also stated that "when it comes down to where do the kids go, I think the bottom line is right now they're in a safe place. They're in a stable environment with their father, and I don't think we need to risk that again by putting them back with the mother."

[16]Although the Department appeared to withdraw its recommendation to terminate the mother's custodial rights near the conclusion of the disposition hearing, the Department's counsel drafted this initial Disposition Order, which terminated the mother's custodial rights.

unsupervised visitation with the children.[17] In its Corrected Disposition Order entered during the pendency of this appeal, the circuit court did not terminate the mother's custodial rights. Instead, the circuit court found that the mother had "substantially complied" with the terms and conditions of her improvement period,[18] but that it was in the children's best interest that their father be appointed as their "primary residential parent." The circuit court stated in this order that it had considered the children's wish to remain in the primary custody of their father, as well as the "totality of circumstances in the case, including but not limited to the academic performance of the children while living with their father and the safe and stable environment they have enjoyed while living there[.]" The circuit court again adopted the MDT's proposed Parenting Plan[19] and dismissed the proceeding from the court's docket.[20]

[17]The MDT's Parenting Plan provides the mother with overnight visitation with the children every Wednesday; visitation every other weekend from 7:00 p.m. on Friday to 7:00 p.m. on Sunday; the parents alternate weeks during the summer school break; the mother has the children on her birthday and Mother's Day and the father has them on his birthday and Father's Day; the father has the children until 1:00 p.m. on Thanksgiving day and the mother has them the remainder of that day; the father has the children until 6:00 p.m. on Christmas Eve and the mother has them Christmas night and Christmas day; and the parents alternate years having the children during their Christmas break from school. The mother, also a member of the MDT, did not agree with this Parenting Plan because she believes that she should be the primary custodial parent.

[18]See supra note 11 for a discussion of these terms and conditions.

[19]During oral argument before this Court, counsel advised that the parents had been following this Parenting Plan since its initial adoption in the Disposition Order entered on March 13, 2013. See supra note 3.

[20]The circuit court's Corrected Disposition Order also advised the father that both the Corrected Disposition Order and the Parenting Plan should "be ratified by the Original Court (continued...)

During oral argument before this Court, all parties agreed that the mother's first assignment of error challenging the termination of her custodial rights in the circuit court's first Disposition Order was mooted by the entry of the Corrected Disposition Order. Thus, the sole remaining issue on appeal is whether the circuit court erred in awarding primary custody of B.H. and S.S. to their father.

II. Standard of Review

We are asked to review a circuit court's disposition order entered upon a petition for termination of parental rights. Our standard of review in this regard is well established:

> "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011). As we have previously explained, "a circuit court's substantive determinations in abuse and neglect cases on adjudicative and dispositional matters—such as whether neglect or abuse is proven, or whether termination is necessary—is entitled to substantial deference in the appellate context." In re Rebecca K.C., 213 W.Va. 230, 235, 579 S.E.2d 718, 723 (2003) (internal citations omitted). With these principles in mind, the parties' arguments will be considered.

III. Discussion

In the present appeal, the mother asserts that the circuit court erred in granting primary custody of B.H. and S.S. to their father as she had substantially complied with the terms of her post-adjudicatory improvement period; the children had lived with her solely since they were infants; and she had been denied an adequate period of unsupervised visitation to demonstrate what she had learned from her improvement period. We begin our analysis of this issue by acknowledging that

> "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). Indeed, '"'[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972).' Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. David Allen B. v.

In re Timber M., 231 W.Va. 44, __, 743 S.E.2d 352, 361 (2013). Further, although parents have substantial rights, "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011).

In the case-at-bar, the mother's post-adjudicatory improvement period provided her with "'an opportunity . . . to modify . . . her behavior so as to correct the conditions of abuse and . . . neglect with which . . . she ha[d] been charged.' In re Emily, 208 W.Va. at 334, 540 S.E.2d at 551." In re Isaiah A., 228 W.Va. 176, 184, 718 S.E.2d 775, 783 (2010). As this Court has previously directed,

> [a]t the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

Syl. Pt. 6, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) (emphasis added). While the circuit court acknowledged the mother's substantial compliance with the terms and conditions of her improvement period, we have recognized that "'it is possible for an individual to show "compliance with specific aspects of the case plan" while failing "to improve . . . [the] overall attitude and approach to parenting.' W.Va. Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990)." In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W.Va. 20, 27, 459 S.E.2d 131, 138 (1995). Moreover, "'[t]he assessment of the overall success of the improvement period lies within the discretion of the circuit court . . . . "regardless of whether . . . the individual has completed all suggestions or goals set forth in family case plans."' In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 626, 408 S.E.2d 365, 378 (1991)." In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W.Va. at 27, 459 S.E.2d at 138.[21]

In reviewing the circuit court's rulings in the case sub judice, we remain mindful that > whenever a child appears in court, he is a ward of that court. W.Va. Code § 49–5–4 (1996); Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992). Courts are thus statutorily reposed with a strong obligation to oversee and protect each child who comes before them. As Justices Cleckley and Albright stated in West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex. rel. Wright v. Brenda C., 197 W.Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996), "[a]bove all else, child abuse and neglect proceedings relate to the rights of an infant." Id. at 477, 475 S.E.2d at 569.

[21]West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3 (2009 & Supp. 2013) requires the Department to develop and file a family case plan if the circuit court awards an improvement period to a parent. While the appendix record reflects that the terms and conditions of the mother's post-adjudicatory improvement period were presented to and approved by the circuit court, the parties' briefs never refer to a family case plan. While we presume that such a plan was developed in the instant proceeding, we nonetheless remind both the Department and the circuit courts of the statutory requirement for such plans.

State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 776, 500 S.E.2d 877, 889 (1997) (J. Workman, dissenting). Further, as we stated in In re Timber M., 231 W.Va. 44, 743 S.E.2d 352 (2013),

> [I]t is clear from our [child abuse and neglect] procedural rules, as well as our prior case law, that "[t]here cannot be too much advocacy for children." State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 570, 490 S.E.2d 642, 657 (1997) (Workman, C.J., concurring). Indeed, if one thing is firmly fixed in our jurisprudence involving abused and neglected children, it is that the "polar star test [is] looking to the best interests of our children and their right to healthy, happy productive lives[.]" In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 632, 558 S.E.2d 620, 631 (2001). This Court has repeatedly stated that a child's welfare acts as "the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." In Re: Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 634, 619 S.E.2d 138, 147 (2005) (internal citation omitted).

231 W.Va. at __, 743 S.E.2d at 367-68.

Grounded in these same fundamental principles, this Court observed that "[t]he question at the dispositional phase of a child abuse and neglect proceeding is not simply whether the parent has successfully completed his or her assigned tasks during the improvement period. Rather, the pivotal question is what disposition is consistent with the best interests of the child." In re Frances J.A.S., 213 W.Va. 636, 646, 584 S.E.2d 492, 502 (2003). Indeed, the overriding consideration must be whether the issues that brought about the allegations of abuse and/or neglect have been addressed by the parent in a substantive and effective manner, and whether those conditions of abuse and/or neglect have been sufficiently remedied such that it is in the child's best interests to be returned to the parent's custody.

Based on our prior precedent and long history of unwavering concern for the health and well-being of children, we now hold that in making the final disposition in a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the level of a parent's compliance with the terms and conditions of an improvement period is just one factor to be considered. The controlling standard that governs any dispositional decision remains the best interests of the child.

In the present appeal, although the mother substantially complied with the terms and conditions of her improvement period, there were continuing concerns that she would again become involved with inappropriate individuals and thereby continue to expose her daughters to the serious risks attendant with such ill-advised associations. We observe that there is evidence for these concerns in the appendix record.

As previously indicated, the mother stipulated that she was aware that John Bailey and Andrew Oldaker were registered sex offenders; that she failed to protect her children by allowing them to be around Messrs. Bailey and Oldaker; and, that as a result of being around Mr. Bailey and other individuals who are registered sex offenders, her children were subjected to sexual abuse. The appendix record also reflects that the mother continued her relationship with John Bailey after learning that he was a registered sex offender because she believed he was innocent. In fact, as late as October 2012, a parenting provider reported that the mother still did not believe that John Bailey is a registered sex offender, but says that she does so as to appear protective of her children. Moreover, during the mother's improvement period, she entered into a relationship with yet another registered sex offender, Patrick Trembly. She endeavored to excuse this relationship on the basis that her daughters were never around Mr. Trembly because they were in the Department's custody.[22] Further, as with John Bailey, after learning that Mr. Trembly was a registered sex offender, the mother believed he was innocent and agreed "to help him go over his papers[,]" "as a friend."

We recognize the difficulty that the circuit court confronted in terms of assessing whether the mother had made "sufficient improvement . . . in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child[ren]." Syl. Pt. 6, in part, Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365. Unlike an abuse and neglect proceeding that involves a dirty home or a parent abusing drugs, where a parent's success in an improvement period can be measured in concrete terms of whether the home is clean or the parent's drug screens are negative, here, the circuit court had to assess whether the mother had internalized what the service providers endeavored to teach her during her improvement period and whether she would, in fact, protect her children by avoiding relationships with individuals in whose presence her children were placed at risk of abuse.

In addressing this difficult question, the circuit court had the benefit of numerous improvement period review hearings during which it was advised of continuing concerns about unsupervised visitation and whether the mother would protect her daughters if they were under her full-time care. At disposition, CPS worker Damron summarized for the circuit court the children's circumstances prior to the instant proceedings when they were residing with the mother: "[T]hey moved several times, missed several days of school, their grades were suffering, and ultimately the children were sexually abused as a result of the mother exposing the children to inappropriate individuals because she put her need to have a relationship above the children's need for safety." Ms. Damron also advised the circuit court that after the children were removed from the mother, they have > excelled in their school work and also their attendance. The children have enjoyed playing basketball and other after school activities that they have never been able to participate in before. The children have a routine every day that creates a safe and stable environment for them and allows them to actually act their age. The children reside full time with their father, who is providing a safe and stable home for them. There have been no safety concerns raised while they have resided with their father.[23]

[23]After the children were removed from foster case and placed in the home of their paternal grandparents in May 2012, the MDT regularly monitored and discussed the contact (continued...)

(Footnote added.). The circuit court received multiple recommendations at disposition that the best interests of the children would be served by remaining in the primary custody of their father with visitation to the mother, which is what the children desired, as well. See Matter of Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 636, 461 S.E.2d 129, 142 (1995) ("Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren). . . . and [the children's] own feelings and emotional attachments should be taken into consideration by the lower court.").

As we have previously held, "'[t]o justify a change of child custody, in addition to a change in circumstances of the parties, it must be shown that such change would materially promote the welfare of the child.' Syl. Pt. 2, Cloud v. Cloud, 161 W.Va. 45, 239 S.E.2d 669 (1977)." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Frances J.A.S., 213 W.Va. 636, 584 S.E.2d 492 (2003). During oral argument, counsel advised this Court that the parents have been following the MDT's Parenting Plan since it was first adopted by the circuit court in March 2013, and that there have been no concerns raised concerning the welfare of the children during that time. Accordingly, based upon our review of the appendix record, the relevant law, and the parties' arguments, and giving substantial deference to the circuit court's dispositional between the children and their father, who lived nearby. Progressively, the children developed a relationship with their father and went to live in his home in October 2012.

decision,[24] this Court concludes that the circuit court's adoption of the MDT's Parenting Plan serves the best interests of B.H. and S.S. by fostering their bond with their mother[25] through liberal unsupervised visitation while simultaneously insuring their safety and materially promoting their welfare by allowing primary custody to remain with their father.

Lastly, we address the mother's argument that she was not given sufficient unsupervised visitations to permit her to demonstrate the full extent of what she had learned from her improvement period.[26] As indicated above, any delay in ordering unsupervised visits was due to the mother's actions and conduct, which led to continuing concerns that she would not protect her daughters from additional acts of abuse. Although the circuit court awarded the mother unsupervised visitation in December 2012, in the face of these continuing concerns, it also directed that the only persons who were to be present during the unsupervised visitation were the mother and the children's maternal grandmother and that the Department, its services provider, or the GAL were to follow-up immediately after such visitations to ensure their appropriateness. The unsupervised visitation began the following month.

[24]See In re Rebecca K.C., 213 W.Va. at 235, 579 S.E.2d at 723.

[25]The GAL stated in his dispositional hearing report that the children were bonded with both parents.

[26]The mother began requesting unsupervised visitation in July 2012.

Based on all of the above, we find that the mother had ample opportunity during her improvement period to demonstrate that she had learned and internalized how to make better parenting decisions and better choices in terms of the persons with whom she chooses to associate so as to protect her daughters. Consequently, any delay in awarding unsupervised visitation was due to the mother's behaviors and actions which caused continuing concern for the children's safety. Accordingly, we find no error in this regard.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon this Court's thorough review of this matter and for the foregoing reasons, the Circuit Court of Wood County's Corrected Disposition Order awarding primary custody of B.H. and S.S. to the father with liberal visitation to the mother is hereby affirmed.

Affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISION

In these two abuse and neglect cases, we issued a Rule to Show Cause against guardian ad litem Courtney Ahlborn to explain why she should not be held in contempt and denied eligibility for future appointments after failing to comply with the scheduling orders mandated by this Court. After considering the imposition of sanctions due to the untimely and poor quality of filings by Ms. Ahlborn and reviewing her responses to the Show Cause Order, we decide not to find Ms. Ahlborn in contempt. Therefore, Ms. Ahlborn will not be denied eligibility for future guardian ad litem appointments. Upon consideration of the standard of review, we find no substantial question of law and no prejudicial error. For these reasons, a memorandum decision is appropriate under Rule 21 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure.

Case No. 14-0660

This appeal involved an order entered by the Circuit Court of Wood County terminating the petitioner Mother's parental, custodial, and guardianship rights of her one-year-old, eight-year-old, and ten-year-old children. This Court entered a scheduling order on July 15, 2014. After the appeal was perfected on September 19, 2014, an amended scheduling order was issued directing that the respondents' briefs be filed on or before October 20, 2014. On October 22, 2014, a second amended scheduling order was entered because the guardian ad litem's brief had not been filed. The amended scheduling order directed that the guardian ad litem's brief be filed on or before October 27, 2014, and reminded counsel that failure to file the brief could result in sanctions being imposed. Ms. Ahlborn again failed to file the guardian ad litem's brief. Consequently, a Notice of Intent to Sanction was entered on October 31, 2014, directing that the brief be filed on or before November 6, 2014. On November 6, 2014, Ahlborn filed a four-page summary response by facsimile.

This appeal involved an order entered by the Circuit Court of Wood County terminating the petitioner Mother's parental, custodial, and guardianship rights of her four-year-old, and seven-year-old children. This Court entered a scheduling order on August 4, 2014, and the appeal was perfected on September 5, 2014. On October 22, 2014, an amended scheduling order was entered because the guardian ad litem's brief had not been filed. The amended scheduling order directed that the guardian ad litem's brief be filed on or before October 27, 2014, and reminded counsel that failure to file the brief could result in sanctions being imposed. Ms. Ahlborn failed to file the guardian ad litem's brief, and a Notice of Intent to Sanction was entered on October 31, 2014, directing that the brief be filed on or before November 6, 2014. On November 6, 2014, Ms. Ahlborn filed by facsimile a four-page summary response.

On November 18, 2014, this Court, on its own motion, proceeded to review and consider the imposition of sanctions due to the untimely and poor quality of filings by Ms. Ahlborn in the instant abuse and neglect cases. In response to this Court's order issuing a rule to show cause in contempt, Ms. Ahlborn filed an initial response brief on December 12, 2014, and two supplemental response briefs on January 12, 2015. Ms. Ahlborn avows that she has been experiencing medical issues over the past few months that interfered with her duties.[1] She also contends that when the second amended scheduling orders were entered in these cases, she was vigorously defending a client in a felony malicious assault case in which her client was ultimately acquitted. She believed she over-focused on this felony work, thereby causing her to neglect her duties with these appeals. She readily expresses remorse for this lack of focus.

Ms. Ahlborn asserts that she takes seriously each of her appointments as a guardian ad litem. She emphasizes that being a guardian to children is one of the most fulfilling parts of her being an attorney, and she apologizes for having filed poor quality briefs in an untimely fashion herein. Ms. Ahlborn contends that if the brevity or form of her summary responses is unacceptable, she will submit additional information to any future submissions to the Court. She also claims that her problems herein are not a true reflection of her ability as a guardian ad litem. Instead, she asserts that her active participation in the underlying cases is what best reflects her abilities. She argues that she routinely attends interviews, meets with her clients at school and in their foster homes, meets with their therapists, and assists with removal when necessary. In addition to these arguments, Ms. Ahlborn attached letters from Margaret Burdette, CASA Director; Stacy

[1] Ms. Ahlborn provided a doctor's excuse indicating that she was to undergo surgery on December 12, 2014, the same day as her deadline to respond to the Court's rule to show cause.

Smith, M.A., L.S.W., with the Department of Health and Human Resources; and Shelly Villers, M.A., L.P.C., a therapist who provides therapeutic services to children suffering from the trauma of abuse and neglect. These letters collectively reflect that Ms. Ahlborn is very effective and attentive in representing children involved in abuse and neglect cases and that her briefing issues before us do not reflect her overall competency as a guardian ad litem.

Having reviewed Ms. Ahlborn's responses to the Rule to Show Cause order issued by this Court and having heard her oral argument in this matter, we find that she has provided sufficient medical reasons to excuse her conduct in the instant cases. As such, we have determined that Ms. Ahlborn shall not be denied her eligibility for future guardian ad litem appointments. In so holding, however, we urge Ms. Ahlborn to seriously reflect upon her failings herein and we expect that Ms. Ahlborn will, hereafter, fully comply with this Court's orders and procedures in the future.

The Court continues to observe an increasing pattern of inadequate and untimely filings made by guardians ad litem in abuse and neglect appeals. Although we decline to hold Ms. Ahlborn in contempt in the instant cases, we wish to re-emphasize how vitally important it is for guardians ad litem to comply with Rule 11(h) of the Rules of Appellate Procedure and this Court's orders in a timely fashion so that abuse and neglect appeals can be promptly and efficiently resolved. Guardians ad litem must submit a response brief or summary response that specifically responds to each of the assignments of error raised on appeal. Also, if the appendix lacks documents from the record that are essential for the Court's review of the case, it is the guardian ad litem's obligation to file a motion to supplement the appendix to ensure that the necessary parts of the record below are included on appeal.

Based on the foregoing, we decline to enter extraordinary sanctions.

No Sanctions Imposed.
Rule to Show Cause Dismissed.

BELINDA KAY C., Plaintiff Below, Appellant,

v.

JOHN DAVID C., Defendant Below, Appellee

No. 22334
Submitted: January 17, 1995
Filed: February 17, 1995

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

"The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances." W.Va. Code § 48-2-15(b)(1), in part.

H. L. Kirkpatrick, III
Ashworth & Kirkpatrick
Beckley, West Virginia
Attorney for the Appellant

John David Cobb, Pro Se

Per Curiam:

In this domestic case, the appellant, Brenda Kay C., claims that the Circuit Court of Raleigh County erred in granting the appellee, her former husband, John David C., unsupervised visitation with the parties' two children. The appellant claims that the appellee has exhibited violent behavior toward the children and that, under the circumstances, the trial court should have required that any visitation with the children be supervised. We agree and, therefore, remand this matter to the circuit court with directions that visitation be at least minimally supervised.

The marriage of the parties in this matter was turbulent, and during it each obtained violence-related warrants against the other. At length, they were divorced. At one time during the pendency of the divorce proceeding, over twenty warrants and cross- warrants were on file in the Magistrate Court of Raleigh County involving the parties or members of their respective families.

In the divorce decree entered on March 9, 1992, the appellant was awarded custody of the parties' two infant sons, who were then seven and four years of age. The appellee was granted visitation, but, in accordance with an agreement between the parties, the court required the visitation to be limited and supervised, in that it was to be conducted at the home of the children's maternal grandmother between 12:00 o'clock noon and 6:00 o'clock p.m. on Saturdays.

Only one supervised visitation was conducted at the children's grandmother's house. That session ended after the appellee became involved in a physical altercation with the appellant's mother, the children's maternal grandmother. As a result of the altercation, police were summoned to the scene.

After the incident, the appellee complained that he had been denied appropriate visitation with the children. A hearing was conducted on the question before a family law master, and the family law master directed that other arrangements be made to afford the appellee reasonable, controlled visitation.

Subsequently, visitations were scheduled at Pinecrest Hospital in Beckley, West Virginia, and the appellant hired an off- duty social worker, who was employed by the West Virginia Department of Human Resources as a member of its Child Protection Agency, to supervise. Two visitation sessions were conducted, but the Pinecrest Hospital administration refused to allow further sessions because during the second visitation, the police were called by the social worker, who apparently felt that the appellee was attempting to remove one, or both, of the children from the hospital premises.

The appellee complained about the denial of further visitation, and the question was addressed at a hearing conducted on December 22, 1992. At that hearing, the appellant testified that the appellee had behaved violently toward the parties' two children and had spanked the older child so hard that he had "whelps" and bruises all over his back. She also said that the appellee would regularly "holler" and curse at the children. She indicated that the children were terrified of the appellee and that upon coming into contact with him, the older child would become physically ill.

In spite of the appellant's testimony, the family law master, at the conclusion of the hearing, recommended that the appellee be afforded unsupervised visitation during specified periods. The circuit court subsequently adopted this recommendation.

West Virginia Code § 48-2-15 governs the circumstances under which a circuit court may in a divorce proceeding grant an noncustodial parent child visitation rights. West Virginia Code § 48-2-15(b)(1), the section specifically dealing with visitation, provides, in relevant part:

> The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the > residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances.

In Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992), this Court concluded that W.Va. Code § 48-2-15(b)(1) is sufficiently broad to allow, and in fact contemplates, that a trial court may order supervised visitation under appropriate circumstances. See also, Sherry L.H. v. Hey, 187 W.Va. 353, 419 S.E.2d 17 (1992).

In the Mary D. case, the Court stated:

> [W]here supervised visitation is permitted, it is of paramount importance that the child's best interests be served by not only what the court deems is in his or [sic] best interests, but also, that the child feels safe when such visitation is exercised by the noncustodial parent. Accordingly, the person who supervises such visitation must be one with whom the child is comfortable and feels safe. It is not enough that the person who is appointed to supervise visitation is in the best interests of the child from the court's standpoint, which would merely assure that no further abuse will occur during such visitation. Rather, the fears of the child must be allayed as well so that the child may be protected not only from further physical harm, but also further psychological harm.

190 W.Va. at 349, 438 S.E.2d at 529.

Although the Mary D. case dealt with sexual abuse, implicit in a reading of it is this Court's view that where the physical welfare of a child is involved, whether because of the sexual propensities of a parent or because of the parent's propensity to violence, supervision is appropriate and may be necessary to safeguard and promote the welfare of the child. Further, there can be no doubt that W.Va. Code § 48-2-15(b)(1) is sufficiently broad to authorize a trial court to place supervisory restrictions on child visitation where there is substantial evidence that a party entitled to visitation might demonstrate violent behavior toward a child.

Of course, the Mary D. case indicates that the best interests of the child must be the determining factor in assessing how supervision should be conducted. This proposition is in accordance with this Court's general rule that:

> "In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syllabus Point 1, Holstein v. Holstein, 152 W.Va. 119, 160 S.E.2d 177 (1968).

Syllabus, Taylor v. Taylor, 168 W.Va. 519, 285 S.E.2d 150 (1981).

In the case presently before the Court, there was substantial evidence indicating that the appellee had on occasion demonstrated violent propensities and some evidence that his violence had, at least, disturbed his children. Although a portion of this evidence came from parties who might be considered to be biased in favor of the appellant, included in the record is the apparently disinterested testimony of Charles Lilly, a lieutenant with the Raleigh County Sheriff's Department. He testified that on one occasion he had been hurriedly summoned to the home of a neighbor, Mrs. Bower, where the appellee had apparently just caused a disturbance. When he got to the house, he could see the appellant on the porch "crying, screaming, she had blood on her," the clear implication of his testimony being that the appellee had assaulted or otherwise seriously disturbed her. When he went inside, he found the man who is currently married to the appellant. He had been assaulted. Further: "The children were crying. Mrs. Bower was crying and upset." When asked whether the children might have been injured, Lieutenant Lilly responded:

> One of the children, I'm not sure which one because, like I say, that's the first -- and I could have possibly saw them again since then, I don't really know. I don't remember. One of them seemed to have had a -- was crying a lot and was complaining of his face hurting.

When asked whether he had observed any kind of mark or injury on the child, Lieutenant Lilly responded, "Just a red place."

While this Court feels that continuing contact by an infant child with a noncustodial parent is important to the welfare of the child, it is also important that a court, in authorizing visitation, prescribe such supervisory requirements as are necessary to ensure that the visitation will not be detrimental to the child's welfare.

Given the evidence in the present case of the previous violent propensities of the appellee, as well as the evidence that those propensities had had some impact upon the parties' children, this Court believes that the trial court erred in authorizing visitation with the appellee without imposing some restrictions on the visitation.

Obviously, the previous visitation arrangements were unsatisfactory. This may have been due, in part, to the choice of supervisors, that is, the appellant's mother in the first instance and a social worker hired by the appellant in the second. Apparently these arrangements provoked, at least to some degree, the appellee.

Rather clearly, implicit in the idea of visitation is the concept that a child be allowed to develop some sort of personal bond with the parent he is visiting. The presence of the appellant's representatives in the previous visitation arrangements may have interfered with the development of that bonding process.

In view of this, the Court believes that an arrangement should be devised by the trial court in which a wholly impartial supervisor is present to monitor future visitation between the appellant's former husband and the infant children. The Court also believes that the impartial supervisor should be directed to refrain, insofar as it is consistent with the welfare of the children, from interfering with the bonding process between the appellant's former husband and the children.

Under W.Va. Code § 48-2-15(b)(1), a trial court has rather broad discretion in setting the conditions of visitation, and, as indicated in Mary D. v. Watt, included within this discretion is the discretion to determine whether the parties involved in the visitation situation require counseling or treatment.

It is rather clear to this Court that the trial court is in a better position to assess the conditions surrounding the parties in the present case. While, as previously indicated, the Court believes that the trial court erred in failing to require supervision, and while the Court finds that the trial court should provide for a neutral supervisor, the Court also believes that the trial court should determine the other conditions to be placed upon the required supervision. At the very least, the trial court should consider whether counseling and treatment are appropriate for the parties.

Implicit in what the Court has said in this opinion is its belief that child visitation with a noncustodial parent is a circumstance which normally will promote the welfare of a child. At the heart of any such visitation is the emotional bonding which can develop between the noncustodial parent and the child. Insofar as it is consistent with the welfare of the children, a trial court, in ordering any sort of supervision of visitation, should take such steps as would promote the bonding between the noncustodial parent and child. If after a period of time there is evidence of bonding, and if the noncustodial parent demonstrates a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated supervision, then it would be appropriate for the trial court to diminish gradually the degree of supervision required with the ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation.

For the reasons stated, this Court believes that the trial court erred in directing that the appellant's former husband be awarded nonsupervised visitation with his children. The Court believes that the circuit court's ruling should be reversed and this case should be remanded with directions that the trial court grant visitation only in accordance with the principles enunciated herein.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

Henry BENNETT, Jr., et al.,
v.
Ralph WARNER, et al., William N. Haney, Sr., et al.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH LAND TITLE INSURANCE CO.

No. 18023.
July 1, 1988.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 22, 1988.

Syllabus by the Court

1. Under article eight, section three of our Constitution, the Supreme Court of Appeals shall have the power to promulgate rules for all of the courts of the State related to process, practice, and procedure, which shall have the force and effect of law.

2. "Under Article VIII, Section 8 [and Section 3] of the Constitution of West Virginia (commonly known as the Judicial Reorganization Amendment), administrative rules promulgated by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia have the force and effect of statutory law and operate to supersede any law that is in conflict with them." Syl.Pt. 1, Stern Brothers, Inc. v. McClure, 160 W.Va. 567, 236 S.E.2d 222 (1977).

3. The 1986 jury selection statute, W.Va. Code § 52-1-1 et seq., mandated the use of juror qualification forms, although amendments to that statute, 1988 W.Va. Acts Ch. 79, nullified that requirement as of July 1, 1988.

4. It is the prerogative of the Legislature to change its mind and alter statutes, but this Court is obligated to uphold the lawful legislative policy that was in effect at the time a cause of action arose.

5. The statutory procedure for challenging the jury selection process requires only a finding of a substantial failure to comply with article 1, chapter 52, of the Code to support such a challenge, with no showing of prejudice required.

6. Parties moving for separate trials of issues pursuant to West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 42(c), or the court if acting sua sponte, must provide sufficient justification to establish for review that informed discretion could have determined that the bifurcation would promote the recognized goals of judicial economy, convenience of the parties, and the avoidance of prejudice, the overriding concern being the provision of a fair and impartial trial to all litigants.

7. Issuance of a broad protective order, based upon the assertion of a blanket privilege against discovery, without scrutiny of each proposed area of inquiry and without giving full consideration to a more narrowly drawn order constitutes abuse of discretion under West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 26(c).

8. It is beyond argument that the courts of this state are open to all and that parties in litigation should have access to their legal proceedings, W.Va.Const., art. III, § 17, and such access to court proceedings is also required as a part of due process, W.Va. Const., art. III, § 10.

Richard W. Cardot, Elkins, for William and Rose Haney.

Braun Hamstead, Charles Town, for Henry Bennett et al.

McGRAW, Justice:

This is an appeal by William N. and Rose Ann Haney, third-party plaintiffs below, from an order of the Circuit Court of Pendleton County which denied their motion for a new trial in their suit against the Appellee, Commonwealth Land Title Insurance Company (Commonwealth), a third-party defendant below. The third-party complaint alleged that Commonwealth's delay in obtaining a right-of-way for the Appellants was intentional infliction of emotional and physical suffering and distress, and the action was brought within the concept known as the "tort of outrage." The trial was bifurcated so as to first consider only the issue of liability. The jury verdict was for Commonwealth, and costs were assessed against the Appellants by the court.

I FACTS

William N. and Rose Ann Haney were Pennsylvania residents who purchased a thirty-six acre tract of property in Pendleton County from Ralph and Nellie Warner on August 9, 1984, with the intention of relocating their residence to West Virginia. Rose Ann Haney said she suffered from severe allergic reactions to a multitude of environmental pollutants, and that the purpose of the relocation was to live in an area free from industrial pollutants.

The title search for the Appellants' property was done by an approved attorney for the Appellee, who also applied for and obtained title insurance for the property from that company. There was no note of defect in the right-of-way mentioned in the deed title report, and the title insurance policy included protection of the right-of-way to the insured property.

After the Appellants had purchased the property and had begun construction of their home, they learned of a possible problem with access to their property when a neighboring property owner (the Bennetts) refused to give them a written right-of-way along an existing access road to their property. The Bennetts denied the Appellants use of that access road in December 1984, and refused a utility right-of-way in April 1985. As a result of this right-of-way problem, the Appellants were delayed in obtaining construction financing. They suspended construction on their home, except for completion of a habitable basement, in which they were living by June 1985.

The Appellants were unsuccessful in obtaining a right-of-way or legal assistance from the attorney involved in the title search, application for title insurance, and purchase of their property. They sought legal assistance from another attorney, who noted the possible coverage by the title insurance of the right-of-way problem, and wrote a letter to the Appellee and their approved attorney in May 1985. The Appellee, through its attorney Braun A. Hamstead, began negotiations for a right-of-way across the Bennett property and notified the Appellants' attorney by letter dated May 31, 1985, that they would take care of the problem. Proposals for a right-of-way agreement were exchanged by the parties in the fall of 1985, but no agreement was reached.

On March 24, 1986, the Bennetts initiated this action by filing a suit seeking injunctive relief against the continuing trespass of the Appellants, the Warners, and one other landowner within the original Warner tract. The Appellants answered that suit, and filed a counterclaim against the Bennetts, a cross-claim against the Warners, and third-party complaint against the Appellee, Commonwealth. The Appellants sought recovery from the Appellee of any amount awarded the Bennetts against the Appellants. They demanded, in addition, judgment against the Appellee in the sum of $100,000 in compensatory damages and $100,000 in punitive and exemplary damages.[FN1]

In a hearing held on January 20, 1987, the court dismissed all matters in the suit except the third-party complaint by the Appellants against the Appellee. On that same day, the Appellants moved for a continuance, citing the inability of Appellant Rose Ann Haney to attend trial because of allergic reactions she had suffered from a recent trip to the courthouse. The Appellants also cited the lack of development of their plea for damages, the inadequacy of the two days allotted to conduct the trial, and the failure of the circuit clerk to obtain juror qualification forms from the potential jurors in the case. The court denied that motion and ordered the parties to appear for trial on January 21, 1987.

The Appellants immediately filed a petition for a writ of prohibition with this Court, seeking a stay of the scheduled trial on the same grounds cited in their motion for continuance below. That petition was refused by this Court on the day presented.

The jury was impaneled on January 20, 1987, with objection from counsel for the Appellant on the basis of the lack of juror qualification forms. The trial was commenced on January 22, 1987, and at that time the court sua sponte bifurcated the trial so as to try the issue of liability separately from the issue of damages, with the Appellants objecting to that bifurcation.

The jury returned a verdict on January 23, 1987, finding that the Appellee was not liable to the Appellants, and the court thereafter entered judgment for the Appellee and ordered the Appellants to pay the costs of the proceedings. The Appellants subsequently filed a motion for a new trial, which was denied. The Appellants appeal that denial.

II JUROR QUALIFICATION FORMS

The Appellants assign error to the failure of the trial court to require the use of juror qualification forms in the jury selection process as required by West Virginia Code § 52-1-1 et seq. (Supp.1987).

Under article eight, section three of our Constitution, the Supreme Court of Appeals “shall have the power to promulgate rules ... for all of the courts of the State related to ... process, practice, and procedure, which shall have the force and effect of law.” As we have previously noted, “[u]nder Article VIII, Section 8 [and Section 3] of the Constitution of West Virginia (commonly known as the Judicial Reorganization Amendment), administrative rules promulgated by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia have the force and effect of statutory law and operate to supersede any law that is in conflict with them." Syl.Pt. 1, Stern Brothers, Inc. v. McClure, 160 W.Va. 567, 236 S.E.2d 222 (1977); see State v. Davis, 178 W.Va. 87, 90, 357 S.E.2d 769, 772 (1987) (and cases cited therein); see also State ex rel. Kenamond v. Warmuth,179 W.Va. 230, 232, 366 S.E.2d 738, 740 (1988).

This Court's rule regarding jury selection, W.Va.T.C.R. XII, does not, however, address the matter of juror qualification forms. Therefore, until this Court promulgates such a rule, the Legislature is not disabled from filling in the interstices, and we see no reason to invalidate the statutory requirements in question. The specific Code sections in question, W.Va.Code § 52-1-7(c), (d), and (e), were new provisions at the time of trial of this case, having taken effect on July 1, 1986. Upon inquiry by counsel for the Appellants on January 15, 1987, which was five days before the date set for striking of the jury, the Circuit Clerk of Pendleton County indicated that juror qualification forms had not been prepared for use in the county, and would, therefore, not be available for inspection in the Appellants' suit.

The Appellants argue that Code § 52-1-7 is mandatory in nature, and that failure to use the juror qualification forms deprives counsel of appropriate information needed to select an impartial jury. The Appellee argues that the purpose of that statute was satisfied by voir dire, in that the questions addressed to the panel produced the information that would have been available on the juror qualification forms. The Appellee also contends that the Appellants waived any error in the jury selection process by failing to object to the jury venire.

The trial court held, in denying the Appellants' motion for a new trial, that the Appellants had preserved their objection to the jury selection procedure, [FN2] but found that the statutory language requiring use of the forms was directory, rather than mandatory, in nature. The court noted that similar forms prepared in the past had not been utilized by attorneys in voir dire. The court further remarked that the county's circuit clerk was new in her position and unfamiliar with the new statute. The trial court held that the failure to use such forms was not grounds for granting a new trial.

The Appellants argue that the legislative choice of the term "shall," rather the term "may," in the 1986 jury selection statute dictates interpretation of the statute as mandatory in nature. Although the Appellants correctly state the general rule of statutory construction, this Court has held that jury selection statutes, notwithstanding the use of the term "shall," are generally directory in nature. State v. Nuckols, 152 W.Va. 736, 745-46, 166 S.E.2d 3, 10 (1968); State v. Hankish, 147 W.Va. 123, 126, 126 S.E.2d 42, 45 (1962). We have, however, found certain provisions of the jury selection statute to be mandatory in nature, such as the preparation of grand jury lists, Syl.Pt. 1, Nuckols, 152 W.Va. 736, 166 S.E.2d 3, and use of the proper procedure for selecting jury commissioners, Syl.Pt. 5, State v. Pratt, 161 W.Va. 530, 244 S.E.2d 227 (1978).

We comprehensively reviewed statutory interpretation of the word "shall" in Canyon PSD v. Tasa Coal Company, 156 W.Va. 606, 611-13, 195 S.E.2d 647, 651-52 (1973), and noted therein that the use of "shall" was not conclusive in determining whether a statute is mandatory or directory. We concluded in Canyon that "[i]n determining whether a statute is mandatory or directory the intention of the Legislature is controlling, and if that intention is to make compliance with the statute essential to the validity of the act directed to be done, the statute is mandatory." Id. 156 W.Va. at 611, 195 S.E.2d at 651.

The language of the 1986 jury selection statute is not sufficiently free from ambiguity so that its meaning may be accepted and applied without resort to interpretation. Syl.Pt. 2, Canyon, 156 W.Va. 606, 195 S.E.2d 647. A review of the statutory language and the legislative history of the 1986 amendments, however, convinces us that the Legislature intended the mandatory use of juror qualification forms primarily as a tool for carrying out public policies identified by the Legislature. Those policies included the random selection of jurors from a cross section of the population and consideration for service of all eligible citizens, W.Va.Code § 52-1-1, as well as the prohibition of certain forms of discrimination in selecting juries, W.Va.Code § 52-1-2.

The 1986 jury selection statute substantially changed traditional procedures in this area, and legislative refinements were made in subsequent years.[FN3] An amendment of the article in 1987 expanded the use of the juror qualification forms in the jury selection process. That expanded use was one of the reasons cited for the Governor's veto of the legislation. H.B. 2380, 68th Legislature, 1st Session (1987) (vetoed March 31, 1987). Finally, the 1988 Legislature amended the article to make the use of juror qualification forms discretionary with each circuit judge, 1988 W.Va.Acts Ch. 79 (to be codified at W.Va.Code § 52-1-5a), which is a strong indication that the Legislature considered their use mandatory prior to that time. The cumulative impression left by the various actions after 1986 reflects recognition of the mandatory nature of the use of the juror qualification forms in the original statutory provisions.

We are, therefore, convinced that the completion of juror qualification forms was a mandatory, rather than directory, provision of the statute in effect at the time of the trial below.[FN4] The 1986 jury selection statute, W.Va.Code § 52-1-1 et seq., mandated the use of juror qualification forms, although subsequent amendments to that statute, 1988 W.Va.Acts Ch. 79, nullified that requirement as of July 1, 1988. It is the prerogative of the Legislature to change its mind and alter statutes, but this Court is obligated to uphold the legislative policy that was in effect at the time a cause of action arose.

Even if we had found that the statutory language was directory, substantial compliance with the article is required. W.Va.Code § 52-1-15. Since the trial court made no attempt to procure the completed forms from the prospective jurors, we must conclude that the trial court failed to comply substantially with article 1, chapter 52.[FN5]

We note that the 1986 statute established a new statutory procedure for challenge of a jury selection process. W.Va.Code § 52-2-15. The Legislature intended that, in the absence of fraud, that section be the exclusive means for a party to challenge the conformity of the jury selection process to the provisions of article 1, chapter 52. W.Va.Code § 52-1-15(c). Prior to passage of that statutory challenge process, we had generally held that parties challenging the jury selection process on the grounds of lack of substantial compliance with directory provisions of the statute had to show that the challenging party was prejudiced by that lack of compliance. State v. Pancake, 170 W.Va. 690, 697, 296 S.E.2d 37, 44 (1982); Syl.Pt. 3, Hankish, 147 W.Va. 123, 126 S.E.2d 42. We hold that the current statutory procedure for challenging the jury selection process requires only a finding of a substantial failure to comply with article 1, chapter 52, of the Code to support such a challenge with no showing of prejudice required.[FN6]

III BIFURCATION OF LIABILITY ISSUE FROM DAMAGES ISSUE

Apparently without any prior discussion with or notice to the parties, the trial court, sua sponte, bifurcated the issue of liability from the issue of damages on the morning that the trial commenced. The bifurcation was announced by the trial court just before the Appellants' counsel made his opening statement. The Appellants' best argument is that the bifurcation created significant procedural problems which weakened the presentation of their case. Counsel's opening statement reflected confusion on his part as a result to the bifurcation. Witnesses had to be called in a different order than that anticipated before the bifurcation, which was part of the cause of one important witness' inability to appear. The Appellants also contend that the bifurcation created tactical problems in presentation of their case because it eliminated any opportunity for the jury to hear evidence on how their harm was compounded by what the Appellants contend was an intentional and outrageous failure by the Appellee to settle the right of way problems as promised.

This Court has not previously addressed directly the propriety of bifurcating the liability and damages issues at trial. West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 42(c) provides, in part, that a trial court may grant a separate trial on any issue when such separate trial furthers convenience, avoids prejudice, or is conducive to expedition and judicial economy. Olson, Modern Civil Practice in West Virginia, § 7-11 (1984). In interpreting this rule, we have held that granting separate trials lies within the sound discretion of the court, Anderson v. McDonald, --- W.Va. 170, 56, 62, 289 S.E.2d 729, 735 (1982), and we will not interfere with a bifurcation decision in the absence of an abuse of that discretion, See Intercity Realty Co. v. Gibson, 154 W.Va. 369, 377, 175 S.E.2d 452, 456-57 (1970). Nevertheless, the trial court's authority is not unlimited and Rule 42(c) "... must be considered ... in light of the general policy of our joinder rules, which are designed to promote consolidation of issues and parties in a single trial to save expense and encourage judicial economy." Syl.Pt. 2, Bowman v. Barnes, 168 W.Va. 111, 282 S.E.2d 613 (1981).

Our sister jurisdictions generally maintain a similar policy of allowing trial court discretion, but requiring that such discretion be exercised in a manner that best promotes judicial economy while avoiding prejudice. Scott v. Stacey's Moving Ltd., 95 Mich.App. 191, 290 N.W.2d 121 (1980); Schwartz v. Binder, 91 A.D.2d 660, 457 N.Y.S.2d 109; (N.Y.App.Div.1982); Finkel v. Finkel, 120 Misc.2d 936, 466 N.Y.S.2d 906 (N.Y.Sup.Ct.1983); See also Carlson v. Cain, 204 Mont. 311, 700 P.2d 607 (1985).[FN7]

The federal appellate courts, in interpreting the similar federal rule on bifurcation,[FN8] "have emphasized that separate trials should not be ordered unless such a disposition is clearly necessary [since] a single trial generally tends to lessen delay, expense and inconvenience to all concerned." 5 Moore's Federal Practice § 42.03 (2d ed. 1987). In Frasier v. 20th Century Fox Film Corp., 119 F.Supp. 495, 497 (D.Neb.1954), the court held that separation of issues:

> should be resorted to only in the exercise of informed discretion and in a case and a juncture which moved the court to conclude that such action will really further convenience or avoid prejudice....
>
> [a] paramount consideration at all times in the administration of justice is a fair and impartial trial to all litigants. Considerations of economy of time, money and convenience of witnesses must yield thereto.
> Id. quoting Moss v. Associated Transport, Inc., 344 F.2d 23, 26 (6th Cir.1965) and Baker v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 11 F.R.D. 440, 441 (S.D.N.Y.1951).

We agree that a court must exercise informed discretion before bifurcating issues at trial. We hold that parties moving for separate trials of issues pursuant to West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 42(c), or the court if acting sua sponte, must provide sufficient justification to establish for review that informed discretion could have determined that the bifurcation would promote the recognized goals of judicial economy, convenience of the parties, and the avoidance of prejudice, the overriding concern being the provision of a fair and impartial trial to all litigants.

It is not apparent that the trial judge in this case adequately considered the goal of judicial economy, or the danger of possible prejudice to the Appellants. There was no discovery or preparation time saved by the bifurcation, since apparently neither party had any advance notice of the trial court's intention to bifurcate. Further, the additional trial that would have been required if the Appellants had prevailed on the issue of liability would have necessarily involved extensive overlap of witnesses and testimony. From the record before us, it is apparent that the surprise bifurcation of the issues of liability and damages was not based on the exercise of informed discretion and may well have denied the Appellants a fair and impartial trial.

We, therefore, hold that the trial court abused its discretion in its sua sponte bifurcation of the liability and damages issues, and further note that orders for the bifurcation of issues should hereafter be supported with sufficient reasons to indicate the exercise of informed discretion by the trial court.

IV APPELLEE'S COUNSEL AS A WITNESS

Braun A. Hamstead, a counsel for the Appellee, had been involved in unsuccessful negotiations for a right-of-way agreement for the Appellants during the period prior to institution of this action. After the Bennetts instituted this suit and the Appellants filed a third-party claim against the Appellee, Oscar M. Bean replaced Hampstead as counsel for the Appellants on the right-of-way negotiations. Bean was successful in negotiating an agreement, which was signed on July 23, 1986.

There are three distinct issues in this assignment of error, only one of which we need address. We find the court below erred in issuing a broad protective order prohibiting the Appellants from deposing Hamstead.[FN9]

Hamstead filed a motion for a protective order, citing no grounds more explicit than his general need for protection from "the annoyance, oppression, and harassment of the above said deposition." He also noted that a proffer made by the Appellants' counsel to the trial court represented that the information sought from Hamstead could also be supplied by in-house counsel for the Appellee, Nathanial Yingling, who was also to be deposed. Counsel for the Appellants, in reply to that motion, argued that Hamstead had not established any need for protection, and contended that Hamstead's deposition was needed in addition to Yingling's in order to establish whether the Appellee acted in bad faith in attempting to secure the Appellants' right-of-way.

The trial court issued a protective order on October 3, 1986, which found the deposition of Hamstead to be "inappropriate as a means of discovery." While stating that the trial court "cannot completely rule out the possibility of relevant evidence from Attorney Hamstead," the order prohibited deposition on the grounds that it would be "oppressive" for the Appellee to have its trial counsel deposed. The court also indicated that "there would be no way to protect a breach of attorney-client privilege at a deposition outside the presence of the court."

Motions for protective orders are made pursuant to West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 26(c). Olson notes that "[the] provisions of West Virginia Rule 26(c) provide a general authorization to the trial court to assure that the conduct of discovery does not result in annoyance, harassment, embarrassment, or in undue burden or expense." Olson, supra, Part III, at § 6.3C. The provisions of that rule include eight possible forms of a protective order, of varying degrees of restrictiveness.

In State ex rel. McGraw v. West Virginia Judicial Review Board, 164 W.Va. 363, 264 S.E.2d 168 (1980), we examined the use of a broad protective order similar to the one issued in the instant case and found that, "[a] protective order may be given, but it must set forth the areas that are open to legitimate inquiry and the areas that are to be protected from inquiry." Id. 164 W.Va. at 367, 264 S.E.2d at 171. In that decision, we held improper a broad protective order, ruling that each area of inquiry in a proposed deposition should be scrutinized as contemplated in Rule 26(c), and "a narrowly drawn protective order, if appropriate, entered." Id.

In this case, the protective order stated that "the Court cannot completely rule out the possibility of relevant evidence from Attorney Hamstead based on what is now before it ..." Issuance of a broad protective order, based upon the assertion of a blanket privilege against discovery, without scrutiny of each proposed area of inquiry and without giving full consideration to a more narrowly drawn order constitutes abuse of discretion under West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 26(c). The protective order was plain error in this case because the order ignored the fact finding function of the proposed deposition as well as its importance in the discovery process in this matter.[FN10]

INABILITY OF APPELLANT ROSE ANN HANEY TO ATTEND AND PARTICIPATE IN THE TRIAL

The Appellants assign error to the refusal of the trial court to grant a continuance they requested on January 20, 1987, citing the inability of Appellant Rose Ann Haney to attend the scheduled trial because of illness. In support of their motion for a continuance, the Appellants submitted a letter from Dr. Henry Taylor, dated January 18, 1987. In that letter, Dr. Taylor expressed the opinion that Appellant Rose Ann Haney was "not medically stable to participate in court proceedings at the present time."

Appellant Rose Ann Haney experienced a serious allergic reaction during a January 15, 1987, attempted deposition at the Pendleton County courthouse. A room in the courthouse had recently been painted, and the Appellant had an allergic reaction to the fumes still in the air.[FN11] Her deposition was later taken at her home.

Dr. Taylor indicated that it was "likely she will experience similar allergic reactions during the jury trial," and that he had discussed with the Appellants the possibility of creating some sort of enclosure within the courtroom with sufficient flow of purified air that would isolate that Appellant from the courtroom environment. The letter further stated that access to an air purifier stored in the Appellants' basement, or purchase of a new air purifier, would be necessary. The letter concluded by indicating that if it were not possible to create a purified enclosure, the Appellant would have to provide testimony by closed circuit television or on videotape to prevent allergic reactions.

The trial court reviewed the letter from Dr. Taylor, but noted that no testimony was offered to the court in regard to the paint odor problem in the courthouse. The court also noted that the Appellee had willingly participated in a video evidentiary deposition of the Appellant prior to trial. The trial court found that the Appellant's medical condition was long-standing and existed long before she moved to West Virginia and well before the suit was filed. The court further found that the condition did not appear to be one that would be resolved in the near future.[FN12] The trial court denied the motion for a continuance, and ordered the trial to proceed on January 22, 1987.

Because of the existence of previously discussed errors sufficient to reverse the judgment of the trial court in this matter, we will not rule on whether the trial court was in error by refusing the motion for a continuance by the appellants. It is, however, beyond argument that the courts of this state are open to all and that parties in litigation should have access to their legal proceedings, W.Va. Const., art. III, § 17, and such access to court proceedings is also required as a part of due process, W.Va. Const., art. III, § 10.[FN13]

VI CONCLUSION

The Appellants have also assigned error to a number of other procedural decisions made by the trial court, and have generally taken exception to the manner in which the trial was conducted. Because we have found sufficient error to reverse the judgment of the trial court and order a new trial, we will not rule on those procedural and conduct objections.

For the reasons stated, the verdict below is reversed and the case is remanded to the Circuit Court of Pendleton County for a new trial.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

FN1. The Appellants were represented for the answer, counterclaim and cross-claim by Oscar M. Bean, retained by the Appellee to represent the Appellants in their right-of-way dispute after institution of the Bennett action. Attorney Richard Cardot was co-counsel on those actions, and also represented the Appellants in their third-party complaint against the Appellee.

After institution of the suit, Bean continued to negotiate with the Bennetts for the Appellants' right-of-way, and an agreement granting the Appellants the required access was signed on July 23, 1986. Consideration for that right-of-way agreement included payment of $4,000 (paid by the Appellee) and certain limitations on the future sale of the Appellants' property. Bean then withdrew as co-counsel for the Appellants by notice filed November 3, 1986.

FN2. We agree with the trial court that the Appellants' objection was preserved. The Appellants objected to the absence of the completed juror qualification forms prior to impaneling the jury. The appellants also unsuccessfully moved to stay the proceedings in the trial court and petitioned this Court for a Writ of Prohibition. Their challenge to the jury selection process is, therefore, in compliance with the challenge procedure found in West Virginia Code § 52-1-15.

FN3. We recognize that the actions of a subsequent legislature ordinarily are not helpful in determining the intent of a prior legislature. Syl. Pt. 4, Detch v. Board of Education, 145 W.Va. 722, 117 S.E.2d 138 (1960). In this case, however, the make-up of the legislative bodies was substantially the same, the amendments were temporally close to the 1986 statute, and the refinements of the 1987 and 1988 amendments occurred under circumstances which reveal the original legislative intent. See Sutherland Stat. Const. § 49.11 (4th ed. 1984).

FN4. In their briefs before this Court, both parties focus their discussion on the use of the juror qualification form to aid parties in voir dire, and the trial court discussed the use of such forms only in the context of providing information for voir dire. Such a discussion does not address the public policies that the use of juror qualification forms was primarily intended to promote.

The use of juror qualification forms, as mandated by the 1986 amendments to article 1, chapter 52, was not primarily intended to provide information to parties for voir dire. Therefore, the existence of alternative sources for such information is not sufficient grounds for failure to use such forms in the jury selection process. The 1986 statute required the use of such forms to provide a record of the identity and characteristics of persons summoned for jury duty so that this Court and others interested in a fair jury system could ensure that trial courts carried out the public policies of broad-based random selection and nondiscrimination underlying that statute.

FN5. Because the trial court made no effort to require the use of such forms, it is not necessary to determine what minor variance might be allowed in the completion of prospective juror forms and still adequately satisfy the statute.

FN6. We also note that the 1988 amendments did not insert in Code § 52-1-15 any requirement for prejudice to the protesting party to support a challenge to the jury selection process.

FN7. In examining Virginia case law on the bifurcation of liability and damages issues when several parties are involved, the Fourth Circuit federal court concluded that, "[a]lthough separate trials have their uses, it would appear that separating the issues of liability and damages in this kind of fact situation can only produce confusion and prevents the jury from any serious consideration of the respective roles of the parties." C.W. Regan, Inc. v. Parsons, Brinckerhoff, Quade and Douglas, 411 F.2d 1379, 1388 (4th Cir.1969). While the fact situation in this case is not identical to that in Regan, we agree with the sentiment expressed therein.

FN8. Fed.R.Civ.P. 42(b).

FN9. The other issues are the trial court's refusal to require Hamstead's withdrawal as counsel for the Appellee and the refusal of the court to allow the Appellants to call Hamstead as a witness.

FN10. As a result of the overly-broad protective order, it was impossible for the trial court to determine what, if any, relevant evidence Hamstead could offer, and in what form such relevant evidence might be introduced. It is similarly impossible to determine whether Hamstead's role as a potential witness would have been sufficient to disqualify him from continuing as counsel for the Appellee. We cannot, therefore, reach the issues of whether Hamstead should have been called as a witness, or whether he should have been disqualified as counsel for the Appellee.

FN11. The Appellant had also experienced a previous allergic reaction in the courthouse on November 19, 1986, following exposure to fumes from perfume or a leather jacket worn by an observer.

FN12. In a hearing on post trial motions, the trial court noted that "there was no way that counsel could assure this court that any time, in any reasonably near period in the future, that she [Appellant Rose Ann Haney] would be able to appear in this Court."

FN13. We believe that the Appellants should have supported their motion for a continuance with more than an unsworn letter from the Appellant's local physician. The trial court, however, could have, sua sponte, required the development of evidence regarding the Appellant's medical condition and the actual provisions that would be necessary to allow her to attend the trial. Deprivation of a party's right to attend trial should only be done after full examination of the party's reasons for not being able to attend, and after exhaustion of any reasonable accommodations.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN RE: BETH ANN B. and COURTNEY DANIELLE B.

No. 25210
Submitted: November 10, 1998
Filed: December 16, 1998

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "' When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.' Syl. Pt. 1, McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996)." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Michael M., W. Va. , 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998).

2. In a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights.

Workman, Justice:

This child neglect matter is before this Court on appeal from a final order of the Circuit Court of Wood County, entered May 19, 1998. The Appellant, Debbie B., protests the circuit court's order, which effected, among other things, a termination of her parental rights in relation to Beth Ann B. and Courtney Danielle B. See footnote 1 The sole issue is whether a circuit court may terminate a parent's rights in his or her children without first conducting a disposition hearing , when the parent has signed an agreed order stipulating to the predicate facts for such termination. We find, under the applicable law, that a disposition hearing is required in those circumstances. Based on our review of the record, See footnote 2 the parties' briefs, See footnote 3 and all other matters submitted to this Court, we conclude that the circuit court erred in failing to conduct a disposition hearing prior to terminating Debbie B.'s parental rights. Accordingly, we reverse and remand the decision of the circuit court.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Debbie B. is the natural mother of Beth Ann B., born February 20, 1995, and Courtney Danielle B., born October 31, 1996. On June 9, 1997, the Appellee, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), filed a petition, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 (1992),See footnote 4 alleging that Beth Ann B. and Courtney Danielle B. were "neglected children," as defined by West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 (1994).See footnote 5 As grounds for this allegation, the DHHR asserted that the health, safety, and welfare of the children were harmed and threatened by Debbie B.'s inability to provide them with supervision, food, shelter, medical care, and clothing. The petition asked that the children be placed into the temporary custody of the DHHR, pending a hearing on the matter.

By order entered June 9, 1997, the circuit court awarded the DHHR temporary custody of the children. A preliminary hearing was waived by agreement of the parties, as reflected in an agreed order entered by the circuit court on July 18, 1997. On November 7, 1997, an adjudicatory hearing was held. After considering the evidence adduced at the hearing, the circuit court found that Beth Ann B. and Courtney Danielle B. were neglected children and that the neglect had been inflicted by Debbie B. These findings were set forth in an order entered by the circuit court on November 24, 1997. By that same order, the circuit court directed that the children remain in the temporary custody of the DHHR.

Following adjudication, Debbie B. was granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The terms and conditions of the improvement period were set forth in a Family Case Plan, dated December 10, 1997, prepared by a DHHR child protective service worker.

Although another hearing in the case was scheduled for April 10, 1998, the hearing did not occur. Instead, on that date, the parties advised the circuit court that they had come to "an agreement regarding the best interests of the children." This ostensible agreement was detailed in an agreed order, which was signed by Debbie B. and her counsel. The material provisions of the agreement, as set forth in the agreed order, were as follows:

> 3. That the respondent-mother failed to comply with the terms of the improvement period;
>
> 6. That there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future by the respondent- mother; that it is in the best interests of the above- named children that there be no reunification at this time with the respondent-mother; that the Department of Health and Human Resources has taken steps and made reasonable efforts to provide the respondent-mother with [the] opportunity to correct the problems and to prevent removal of the children; that the above-named children need permanency in their lives; that the respondent-mother is incapable of properly parenting the above-named children.

After outlining the parties' agreement, the agreed order provided that "the Court does hereby adopt the above as its findings." The order concluded that the parental rights of Debbie B. in relation to Beth Ann B. and Courtney Danielle B. be terminated. On May 19, 1998, the circuit court entered the agreed order.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

In considering the circuit court's order, this Court employs the two-prong deferential standard recently enunciated in syllabus point one of State v. Michael M., W. Va. , 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998) , where we stated:

> " When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard." Syl. Pt. 1, McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996).

III. DISCUSSION

The only error assigned in this appeal is that the circuit court erred in failing to conduct a disposition hearing prior to terminating the Appellant's parental rights, as required by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. The DHHR does not refute that the circuit court disposed of this case based entirely on the parties ' agreement, as embodied in the agreed order, without any disposition hearing. Rather, the DHHR argues that Debbie B. understood "the effect of signing the agreed order, " and also points to the fact that her attorney was present during that signing. See footnote 6 Thus, the issue before this Court is whether the circuit court can terminate parental rights, in a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, without first conducting a disposition hearing, where the parent has signed an agreed order containing stipulations of the facts necessary for such termination.

The statutory scheme applicable in child abuse and neglect proceedings provides for an essentially two phase process. The first phase culminates in an adjudication of abuse and/or neglect. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1996). The second phase is a dispositional one, undertaken to achieve the appropriate permanent placement of a child adjudged to be abused and/or neglected. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (1996).See footnote 7 It is this latter phase that is relevant to this appeal.

In the dispositional phase of a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the "party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child" are entitled, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(c), to "a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses." Id. In addition, West Virginia Code § 49-6-5, which sets forth a panalopy of dispositional alternatives available to the circuit court, including termination of parental rights, provides that "[t]he court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner [DHHR] and respondents [parent(s)] an opportunity to be heard." Id. If the State seeks termination of parental rights, then West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 requires that certain facts be proven as a prerequisite to such termination. Those ultimate facts, which the State must prove, are delineated in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (a)(6) and § 49-6-5 (b).

Clearly, the statutory scheme contemplates a disposition hearing prior to termination of an individual's parental rights. This Court recognized as much in syllabus point one of West Virginia Department of Welfare ex rel. Eyster v. Keesee, 171 W. Va. 1, 297 S.E.2d 200 (1982), where we held:

> "West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 2, as amended, and the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions prohibit a court or other arm of the State from terminating the parental rights of a natural parent having legal custody of his child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing." Syl. pt. 2, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

Our decision in Keesee preceded the advent of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, adopted by order of this Court on December 5, 1996, and effective on January 1, 1997. But the mandatory prerequisite of a disposition hearing where parental rights are being terminated is plainly incorporated in the Rules.

Rule 33 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides, in pertinent part:

> (b) Voluntariness of consent. Before accepting a stipulation of disposition, the court shall determine that the parties understand the contents of the stipulation and its consequences, the parties voluntarily consent to its terms, and the stipulation or uncontested adjudication meets the purposes of these rules and controlling statute and is in the best interests of the child. The stipulations shall be specifically incorporated in their entirety into the court's order reflecting disposition of the case.
>
> Id.

Moreover, the relevant portions of Rule 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provide:

> (a) Uncontested termination of parental rights. If a parent voluntarily relinquishes parental rights or fails to contest termination of parental rights, the court shall make the following inquiry at the disposition hearing:
> (3) If the parent(s) is/are present in court and voluntarily has/have signed a relinquishment of parental rights, the court > shall determine whether the parent(s) fully understand(s) the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is/are aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was/were informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

>
> (4) If the parent(s) is/are not present in court but has/have signed a relinquishment of parental rights, the court shall determine whether there was compliance with all state law requirements regarding a written voluntary relinquishment of parental rights and whether the parent(s) was/were thoroughly advised of and understood the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is/are aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was/were informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.
> Id.

While Rules 33 and 35 obviously contemplate the use of stipulations in connection with child abuse and neglect proceedings, these rules nonetheless require a disposition hearing even where a parent has signed a stipulation of facts which, if proven, would support a termination of parental rights under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5.See footnote 8 Parties cannot by stipulation negate the necessity for a hearing which comports with the provisions of Rules 33 and 35.

State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983), was procedurally analogous to this case in that the adjudicatory hearing under West Virginia Code § 49-6-2 was aborted when the parties entered into a voluntary arrangement regarding the custody of the allegedly abused child. In syllabus points one and two of T.C., this Court held:

> In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2, and determine "whether such child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.

W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq., does not foreclose the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan. However, such arrangements are not without restrictions. First, the plan is subject to the approval of the court. Second, and of greater importance, the parties cannot circumvent the threshold question which is the issue of abuse or neglect.

Accordingly, under the facts of this case, we hold that in a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights. See footnote 9

IV. CONCLUSION

Therefore, upon all of the foregoing, we reverse the order appealed from and remand this case to the circuit court with directions to conduct a disposition hearing for the limited purposes of ascertaining whether Debbie B. fully understood the contents of the agreed order and the consequences of the termination of her parental rights, was aware of possible, less drastic alternatives than termination, voluntarily consented to such termination, and was informed of the right to a disposition hearing. See footnote 10 If after exploring these matters the circuit court finds affirmatively on these points, and further finds that the stipulated disposition (i.e., termination of parental rights) is in the best interests of the children and meets the purposes of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and West Virginia Code § 49-6-5, then Debbie B.'s parental rights should be terminated. Furthermore, as in all cases involving children, the circuit court must act with great dispatch to bring safety, stability, security, and permanency to the lives of Beth Ann B. and Courtney Danielle B.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 In keeping with our usual practice in matters of child abuse and neglect, we refer to the individuals involved in this proceeding using the initials of their surnames. See In Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 303 n.1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n.1 (1989).

Footnote: 2 The record before this Court is minimal. Although it is apparent that the testimony of several witnesses was presented during the adjudicatory hearing, we have received no transcripts of that testimony, or any other testimony in this case. The record is also devoid of a child's case plan, which the DHHR is required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) to prepare, and which must comport with that statute and with Rule 28 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

Footnote: 3 We feel compelled to comment on the bare bones nature of the Appellant's brief. While this Court certainly encourages lawyers to submit appellate briefs which are concise, we also put a premium on clarity. From the Appellant's cryptic brief, it is unclear to us on what grounds she claims that the lack of a disposition hearing adversely impacted her rights or what relief she is seeking.

Footnote: 4 West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 was amended by the Legislature in 1998. The amendment does not impact the outcome of this case.

Footnote: 5 West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 defines a "neglected child" to mean a child:

(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or

(B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian . . . .

Id. West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 was amended by the Legislature in 1998, but the amendment did not alter the foregoing definition of a "neglected child."

No. 17482.

July 1, 1988.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody or his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syllabus Point 1, In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

2. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), allows a parental improvement period, while the child is temporarily physically removed from the alleged abusive situation, as the court may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period.

3. W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.

Teresa McCune, Williamson, for the mother, Mary Wright.

Timothy Koontz, Susan B. Perry, Williamson, for the children.

MILLER, Justice:

Mary W. See footnote 1 appeals from a final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County which terminated her parental rights to her five minor children. She first assigns as error the legal insufficiency of the child abuse petition. She also contends the trial court erred in denying a statutory improvement period, in failing to adopt the least restrictive alternative appropriate to the circumstances, and in relying on her status as a victim of domestic violence as a basis for the termination of parental rights.

I.

Mary W. and her husband, J.B.W., See footnote 2 are the natural parents of five minor children, See footnote 3 the youngest of whom is now ten years old. On June 3, 1985, the West Virginia Department of Human Services (DHS) took emergency custody of the children. See footnote 4 In a petition to terminate parental rights filed on June 4, 1985, the DHS alleged that on April 30, 1985, the husband, J.B.W. sexually abused and assaulted his then seventeen-year-old daughter, B.J. The petition alleged that since the sexual assault, J.B.W. had been out of the marital home until June 1, 1985, when he again stayed overnight. The DHS also alleged that J.B.W. habitually physically abused his children and that Mary W. failed to protect the children from her husband's abuse. See footnote 5

A hearing on the petition was held on June 10, 1985, at which all parties appeared except J.B.W., who was then a patient in St. Mary's Hospital. The court appointed a guardian ad litem for J.B.W. and a guardian ad litem for the five children. Testimony was taken, but no record was made of the proceedings. In an order entered August 1, 1985, the court denied motions for an improvement period, found no less drastic alternative than the removal of the children, ordered physical and legal custody to be placed with DHS, and scheduled a final hearing.

On September 17, 1985, at the final hearing, all parties appeared and were represented by counsel. J.B.W. and Mary W. individually requested improvement periods which the court denied. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court recited facts to be part of the final written order, which was entered on November 22, 1985. The trial court found that J.B.W. had abused his children, that Mary W. had failed to protect them, that no reasonable likelihood existed that the conditions of neglect and abuse could be substantially corrected, and that Mary W. and J.B.W. had refused and were unwilling to cooperate in the development of a plan to effectuate necessary changes. On that basis, the court concluded that there was no less drastic alternative than to terminate the parental rights of J.B.W. and Mary W. See footnote 6

II.

Mary W. first argues that the abuse petition filed by DHS did not contain specific factual allegations as required by W.Va.Code, 49-6-1(a) (1977). See footnote 7 In State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981), we held in Syllabus Point 1:

> "If the allegations of fact in a child neglect petition are sufficiently specific to inform the custodian of the infant of the basis upon which the petition is brought, and thus afford a reasonable opportunity to prepare a rebuttal, the child neglect petition is legally sufficient."

See also State ex rel. Moore v. Munchmeyer, 156 W.Va. 820, 197 S.E.2d 648 (1973).

The DHS filed a form petition in this case which recited the pertinent statutory language and contained only blank spaces for the specifics of the case. The DHS attached to the petition a summary which contained identifying information, the specific abusive conduct, and supportive services provided to the family. Mary W. does not argue that the summary fails to comply with statutory notice requirements. Consequently, we find that the petition and the attached written summary with its recitation of facts satisfies the statute.

III.

Mary W. next contends that she was unlawfully denied a statutory improvement period under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), before her parental rights were terminated. See footnote 8 It is useful to review the constitutional underpinnings upon which this statutory improvement period rests. In Syllabus Point 1 of In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), this Court, relying on Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 31 L.Ed.2d 551 (1972), recognized that a natural parent has a constitutional right to the custody of his or her infant children:

> "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody or his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions."

See also State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983); State ex rel. Miller v. Locke, 162 W.Va. 946, 253 S.E.2d 540 (1979).

The United States Supreme Court's continued adherence to this basic constitutional principle is reflected in Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 753, 102 S.Ct. 1388, 1394-95, 71 L.Ed.2d 599, 606 (1982):

> "The fundamental liberty interest of natural parents in the care, custody, and management of their child does not evaporate simply because they have not been model parents or have lost temporary custody of their child to the State. Even when blood relationships are strained, parents retain a vital interest in preventing the irretrievable destruction of their family life."

In Santosky, the Supreme Court held that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited the termination of parental rights upon less than clear and convincing evidence. Accord In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981); W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) (1984).

While parents enjoy an inherent right to the care and custody of their own children, the State in its recognized role of parens patriae is the ultimate protector of the rights of minors. The State has a substantial interest in providing for their health, safety, and welfare, and may properly step in to do so when necessary. Stanley v. Illinois, supra. This parens patriae interest in promoting the welfare of the child favors preservation, not severance, of natural family bonds, a proposition that is echoed in our child welfare statute. W.Va.Code, 49-2B-1 (1981). See footnote 9 The countervailing State interest in curtailing child abuse is also great. In cases of suspected abuse or neglect, the State has a clear interest in protecting the child and may, if necessary, separate abusive or neglectful parents from their children.

The dual nature of the State's interest is evidenced by the statute which permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period when abuse or neglect is alleged. See footnote 10 The court must allow the improvement period unless "compelling circumstances" justify a denial, as we explained in State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. at 692-93, 280 S.E.2d at 321:

> "Clearly, the statute presumes the entitlement of a parent to an opportunity to ameliorate the conditions or circumstances upon which a child neglect or abuse proceeding is based pending final adjudication, no doubt in recognition of the fundamental right of a parent to the custody of minor children until the unfitness of the parent is proven. See, e.g., In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). The statute permits the court to deny such a request only upon a finding of 'compelling circumstances.' "

See also In Re Thaxton, 172 W.Va. 429, 307 S.E.2d 465 (1983).

It is important to observe that W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), allows a parental improvement period, while the child is temporarily physically removed from the alleged abusive situation, as the court "may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period."

This is the thrust of Mary W.'s claim. She moved for an improvement period at the June 10, 1985 preliminary hearing. The trial court found the alleged history of abuse by her husband, J.B.W., to be a compelling circumstance justifying the denial of an improvement period. At the final hearing, Mary W. renewed her motion. The trial court again denied the improvement period, stating that to return the children to the mother, who had continued contact with the father, "would put these children at great risk again."

It appears that the trial court believed that its only option in granting an initial improvement period was to return the children to Mary W. Nothing in the record indicates the trial court gave any consideration to the possibility of granting Mary W. an improvement period without custody of the children. As previously observed, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), expressly permits a circuit court to grant an improvement period with temporary custody with the DHS or other appropriate agency. In Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. at 693, 280 S.E.2d at 321-22, we noted this provision:

> "[T]he statute does not limit 'improvement period' to a period of time during which the mother and child live together. The statute specifically provides that the court may order the child into the temporary custody of the Department of [Human Services] or another agency during the improvement period."

We found in Scritchfield no compelling circumstances justifying the denial of such an improvement period. There the natural mother's rights had been permanently terminated, as in this case. The underlying problem with the mother was that she had suffered a mental illness which had occasioned the neglect and abuse of the children. During the course of the proceeding, she had been hospitalized at a mental health facility. At the time of the final hearing, testimony indicated she had recovered from her mental illness to the extent she would be able to care for her children. She had asked for an improvement period, but the court had denied it and we concluded this was reversible error.

The same type of custodial transfer can be made under W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(c) (1984). See footnote 11 This section empowers circuit courts at the dispositional hearing to grant an improvement period for up to one year as an alternative disposition, during which parental rights cannot be permanently terminated. During this period, the court can place the child with the parents, relatives, or appropriate agencies. See footnote 12

The failure to consider an improvement period for Mary W. was due in large part because the trial court found that she "knowingly allowed" the sexual abuse. This standard is derived from W.Va.Code, 49-1- 3(a) (1984), which defines an abused child to include one whose parent "knowingly allows another person" to commit the abuse. See footnote 13

We do not believe the record supports the trial court's legal conclusion that Mary W. "knowingly allow[ed]" the sexual abuse. Courts in other states with similar child abuse statutes, which contain a "knowingly allows" type provision, have focused on whether the parent in some manner condoned the abuse. Termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent. Typical is In Interest of A.M.K., 723 S.W.2d 50 (Mo.App.1986), where a mother admitted knowing that her husband had sexually abused their children. The court terminated the mother's parental rights saying "there is no evidence that the appellant attempted to make a hot-line report or to have her husband charged with child abuse." 723 S.W.2d at 54.

Similarly, where the mother admitted to various people that she had observed sexual abuse and had condoned it with a statement that her daughter needed to be taught about "such things" before she started dating, the court terminated the mother's parental rights for her omission to act. In Interest of H.W.E., 613 S.W.2d 71 (Tex.Civ.App.1981); see also In Interest of Armentrout, 207 Kan. 366, 485 P.2d 183 (1971); Re: Biggs, 17 Cal.App.3d 337, 94 Cal.Rptr. 519 (1971); In Re: Van Vlack, 81 Cal.App.2d 838, 185 P.2d 346 (1947).

We followed this view in In the Interest of Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), and terminated a father's parental rights for his nonaction in protecting his child. See footnote 14 There the father had asserted that he should be held blameless for his nonaction in protecting his child. In that case, a 38-day-old infant suffered life-threatening injuries including a skull fracture, other broken bones, and bruises. The father supported his wife's explanation for the infant's injuries, even though that testimony was inconsistent with the medical evidence and he had witnessed the first injury to his child.

This case is analogous to Shapley v. Tex. Dept. of Human Resources, 581 S.W.2d 250 (Tex.Civ.App.1979), in which the appellate court reversed the termination of a mother's parental rights where the father had physically abused their eighteen-month-old child. The mother took the child to a hospital emergency room, reported that her husband was a heavy drinker, and that he had beaten the child the night before and on one other prior occasion. The mother had delayed reporting the second occurrence until after her husband had gone to work. The Department of Human Resources temporarily removed the child from the home.

Three months later, the father again became intoxicated and abused the mother and the family's pet puppy. She filed suit for divorce. Witnesses who interviewed the mother after the first hearing on the abuse matter believed it unlikely that she would remain separate and apart from her husband and there was danger of future injury to the child by the father. The court held the evidence insufficient to terminate the mother's parental rights saying: "It was only because of the mother's love for her child that the beating was ever called to the attention of the authorities in the first place. Her delay could well have been caused by her own fear of her husband." 581 S.W.2d at 254. See also In Interest of Loitra, 81 Ill.App.3d 962, 36 Ill.Dec. 833, 401 N.E.2d 971 (1979); In Re Adoption of P., 475 Pa. 197, 380 A.2d 311 (1977).

Here, the evidence shows that Mary W. did not knowingly allow any sexual abuse. Her daughter told her about the sexual assault the day after it happened. She was unable to get away from her husband that day, but the following day, while her husband was absent, she paid a neighbor to take her and the children to her parent's residence. See footnote 15 That same day she reported the abuse to DHS and requested services including a place to stay. See footnote 16 The reasons for delay in this case, as in Shapley, centered on an opportunity to get away from an abusive spouse.

There was also testimony that when J.B.W. had attempted to sexually abuse the daughter during the evening hours on the day of the assault, Mary W. had interceded and was beaten and threatened with a knife. Certainly, a parent charged with acts of omission, who takes reasonable steps to protect her child and who does not defend the abuser or condone the abusive conduct, does not "knowingly allow" the abuse.

The trial court also found that Mary W. failed to protect her children by failing to keep J.B.W. away and by not separating from him. Her perceived inability to break from the pattern of abuse was described by the court as classic spouse abuse: "Men who abuse their wives classically follow that pattern and the family follows that pattern. A man beats his wife, makes promises and they kiss and make up, and there is a period psychologists call 'the honeymoon'. At some point following the honeymoon there is a cycle of abuse and the cycle starts all over again." We recognized this syndrome, which we termed "battered woman's syndrome," in State v. Steele, 178 W.Va. 330, 359 S.E.2d 558 (1987). See footnote 17 See also State v. Duell, 175 W.Va. 233, 332 S.E.2d 246 (1985).

The court apparently believed that Mary W. would continue to reconcile with her husband, thereby exposing the children to further abuse by him. However, as we have previously pointed out, an improvement period without custody of the children would have enabled Mary W. to overcome this perceived problem. See footnote 18

The court's decision also rested on the finding that Mary W. would not cooperate in the development of a plan to provide for the safety of her children, which would involve her separating from her husband. The difficulty with this conclusion is that it is not borne out in the record. Prior to the child abuse incident, the DHS had not provided any regular services to the family for some two years. There was no showing that an improvement plan had been developed and had not been followed by Mary W. on the current charges.

In fact, the record indicates that Mary W. after reporting the sexual abuse incident the day after it happened to the authorities was left to fend for herself and her family. She sought refuge with relatives. There is no indication in the record that DHS acted under W.Va.Code, 49-6A-9 (1977), See footnote 19 to bring into play its family protective services to assist Mary W. and her family. We think it inappropriate and erroneous under these circumstances to deny Mary W. an improvement period.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Mingo County is reversed, and this case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. These proceedings shall include granting an improvement period with an appropriate family case plan under W.Va.Code, 49-6D- 3(a) (1984). The court should decide, based on the conditions then existing, whether the children may physically reside with Mary W. during the improvement period, and should ultimately determine whether or not to reunite Mary W. and her children.

Reversed and Remanded With Directions.

Footnote: 1 We follow our past practice in domestic relations and juvenile cases which involve sensitive facts and do not utilize the last names of the parties. The husband is known only by his initials, J.B.W. See, e.g., Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W. and Grady W., 177 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987); West Virginia Dept. of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985).

Footnote: 2 On November 26, 1986, we rejected J.B.W.'s appeal from an order terminating his parental rights.

Footnote: 3 There were two older children, a daughter age twenty-one and a son age nineteen living at home at the time of these proceedings. Because of their ages, they were not involved in these proceedings. The daughter has now graduated from Alice Lloyd College in Pippa Passes, Kentucky.

Footnote: 4 W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(c) (1984), in pertinent part, states: "If a child or children shall, in the presence of a child protective service worker of the department of human services, be in an emergency situation which constitutes an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child or children, as that phrase is defined in section three [§ 49-1-3], article one of this chapter, and if such worker has probable cause to believe that the child or children will suffer additional child abuse or neglect or will be removed from the county before a petition can be filed and temporary custody can be ordered, the worker may, prior to the filing of a petition, take the child or children into his or her custody without a court order: Provided, That after taking custody of such child or children prior to the filing of a petition, the worker shall forthwith appear before a circuit judge or a juvenile referee of the county wherein custody was taken, or if no such judge or referee be available, before a circuit judge or a juvenile referee of an adjoining county, and shall immediately apply for an order ratifying the emergency custody of the child pending the filing of a petition."

Footnote: 5 W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), provides: " 'Abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by: (1) a parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly inflicts, attempts to inflict, or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury, or substantial mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home." (Emphasis added.)

Footnote: 6 See W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 (1984), for disposition of neglected or abused children.

Footnote: 7 W.Va.Code, 49-6-1(a) (1977), states in pertinent part: "The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought."

Footnote: 8 The text of W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), is:
"In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-D of this chapter."

Footnote: 9 W.Va.Code, 49-2B-1 (1981), provides in pertinent part:
"It is the policy of the State to assist a child and his or her family as the basic unit of society through efforts to strengthen and preserve the family unit. In the event of absence, temporary or permanent, of parents or the separation of a child from the family unit, for care or treatment purposes, it is the policy of the State to assure that a child receives care and nurturing as close as possible to society's expectations of a family's care and nurturing of its child. The State has a duty to assure that proper and appropriate care is given and maintained."

Footnote: 10 For the full text of W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), see note 8 supra.

Footnote: 11 W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(c) (1984), provides:
"The court may as an alternative disposition allow to the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed twelve months. During this period the parental rights shall not be permanently terminated and the court shall require the parent to rectify the conditions upon which the determination was based. No more than one such postdispositional improvement period may be granted. The court may order the child to be placed with the parents, a relative, the state department or other appropriate placement during the period. At the end of the period the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the conditions have been adequately improved, and at the conclusion of such hearing, shall make a further dispositional order in accordance with this section." (Emphasis added).

Footnote: 12 Given the ages of Mary W.'s children, we note that W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) (1984), contains the following provision giving a child a voice in the termination decision: "Notwithstanding any other provisions of this article, the permanent parental rights shall not be terminated if a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court, objects to such termination. No adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final."

Footnote: 13 For applicable text of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), See note 5, supra.

Footnote: 14 The current definition of "abused child," found in W.Va.Code, 49-1-3, see note 4, supra, was adopted in 1984. The former definition limited acts of omission to inadequate supervision.

Footnote: 15 There was testimony in the record that Mary W. does not know how to drive an automobile.

Footnote: 16 The court found that Mary W. obtained a warrant against her husband for the April 30, 1985 abuse.

Footnote: 17 In Steele, we commented on one phase of the syndrome which was that often "the abused woman is unable to free herself from her situation or report the abuse to the authorities." 178 W.Va. at 336, 359 S.E.2d at 564. We quoted this language from Smith v. State, 247 Ga. 612, 618-19, 277 S.E.2d 678, 683 (1981): "Because there are periods of harmony, battered women tend to believe their husbands are basically loving, caring men, that they themselves are somehow responsible for their husbands' violent behavior, and that they are low in self-esteem and feel powerless." For an earlier view of this problem, when it is said that the law permitted a husband to beat his wife with a stick no larger than his thumb, see Stedman, Rights of Husband to Chastise Wife, 3 Va.L.Rev. 241 (1917). For more current analyses, see N. Taub, Adult Domestic Violence, The Law's Response, 8 Victimology: An Int'l J. 152, 152-57 (1983); K. Waits, The Criminal Justice System's Response to Battering: Understanding the Problem, Forging the Solutions, 60 Wash.L.Rev. 267 (1985).

Footnote: 18 The trial court appeared to center on the week in which the husband claimed he cohabitated at the family home. This was after criminal charges had been initiated for his sexual abuse of his daughter. Mary W. claimed that she was staying with friends and family members, but did return to the home to clean it. The children had been previously removed by court order and placed in temporary custody of the DHS. Two neighbors who testified were somewhat equivocal. One said she saw the husband at the house in the early evening hours drinking coffee. She also stated that she was aware that Mary W. was not living there full time. Another neighbor saw both of them walk by her house. She also stated she was informed earlier by Mary W. not to disclose to J.B.W. where she was staying.

Footnote: 19 W.Va.Code, 49-6A-9 (1977), in material part, states:
"The state department shall establish or designate in every county a local child protective service to perform the functions set forth in this article.
"Except in cases involving institutional abuse or cases in which police investigation also appears appropriate, the child protective service shall be the sole public agency responsible for receiving, investigating or arranging for investigation and coordinating the investigation of all reports of child abuse or neglect. In accordance with the local plan for child protective services, it shall provide protective services to prevent further abuse or neglect of children and provide for or arrange for and coordinate and monitor the provision of those services necessary to ensure the safety of children. The local child protective service shall be organized to maximize the continuity of responsibility, care and service of individual workers for individual children and families."

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN RE: BILLY JOE M. AND JASON M.,

No. 25888

Submitted: June 1, 1999

Filed: July 15, 1999

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. “Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. “When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.” Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W .Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

3. “Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.” Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

4. Where allegations of neglect are made against parents based on intellectual incapacity of such parent(s) and their consequent inability to adequately care for their children, termination of rights should occur only after the social services system makes a thorough effort to determine whether the parent(s) can adequately care for the children with intensive long-term assistance. In such case, however, the determination of whether the parents can function with such assistance should be made as soon as possible in order to maximize the child(ren)'s chances for a permanent placement.

5. Concurrent planning, wherein a permanent placement plan for the child(ren) in the event reunification with the family is unsuccessful is developed contemporaneously with reunification efforts, is in the best interests of children in abuse and neglect proceedings.

6. A permanency plan for abused and neglected children designating their permanent placement should generally be established prior to a determination of whether post- termination visitation is appropriate.

Workman, Justice:

This is an appeal by Brenda and Hubbard M. See footnote 1 (hereinafter "Appellants") from an order of the Circuit Court of Nicholas County terminating their parental rights to their two sons, Billy Joe M. and Jason M., See footnote 2 currently ages eleven and twelve, respectively, and denying post-termination visitation rights. The Appellants contend that denial of visitation is not in the best interests of the children. They do not, however, appeal the termination of parental rights. We reverse and remand for implementation of permanency plans See footnote 3 and additional evaluation regarding the potential for successful post-termination visitation, both after the permanency plans are implemented and in the interim.

I. Facts

The Appellants are the natural parents of three sons. See footnote 4 On August 14, 1998, emergency petitions for the custody of Billy Joe and Jason were filed in the Circuit Court of Nicholas County by Mr. Mark Abbot, a child protective services worker for the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR").See footnote 5 Subsequent to an October 13, 1998, adjudicatory hearing, the lower court ruled, by order dated October 29, 1998, that Billy Joe and Jason were abused and/or neglected children.See footnote 6 The lower court found the following conditions in existence at the time of the filing of the August 1998 petition in Nicholas County: garbage including rotten food scattered through the house; animal urination and defecation in the house; matted hair and dirty clothing on the children; children eating from garbage cans; inability of the children to perform basic hygiene; and Billy Joe's ear compacted with foreign items including toe nails, plastic, and sand. Billy Joe also vomited in the car of a transportation provider for DHHR, and his vomit contained sticks, pine needles, and cotton balls. In its October 29, 1998, order, the lower court provided that the possibility of visitation between the parents and the children was to be evaluated by the DHHR, and a dispositional hearing was scheduled for December 4, 1998. The lower court further found that the health and well-being of the children would be endangered by permitting them to return to their parents' home.

During the December 4, 1998, hearing, the lower court received the testimony of Mr. Mark Abbott, the child protective services worker assigned to this case in Nicholas County. Mr. Abbott testified regarding the children's behavior problems and acting out in the foster home. According to Mr. Abbott's testimony, the children urinated in trash cans, behind closed doors, and in hampers. Mr. Abbott indicated that the children spat on the walls during their first few weeks in foster care and that one of the children saved his feces in a can. The children also destroyed property at their foster home, including video tapes and a garden. Jason reported suicidal thoughts, and Billy Joe reported homicidal thoughts. Each child was eventually placed, separately, in in-patient psychiatric care. See footnote 7

Ms. Nancy Conner, a child protective services worker in Nicholas County, also testified that visitations between the parents and children had caused the children to behave in a negative manner. Ms. Conner testified that in her opinion, visitation with the parents was not in the best interests of the children and would impede the progress of the children.

Ms. Patty Salisbury, a child protective services worker assigned to the case in Braxton County and continuing to work with the family in Nicholas County, testified concerning the effects of monthly parental visitation, occurring during the period the children were removed from the home in Braxton County. She explained that the children's behavior in foster care was "uncontrollable" for two or three days after parental visitation. Ms. Salisbury indicated that the children would become emotionally upset, cry, withdraw, and engage in acting out behaviors such as damaging objects after visiting with their parents. Ms. Salisbury explained that the children were confused about seeing their parents and then being separated from them again. The confusion, according to Ms. Salisbury, manifested itself by disruption of school patterns, poor interaction with foster parents and other children in the home, and destruction of property by hitting or kicking walls or breaking things.

Dr. Stephen O'Keefe, Ph.D., a licensed psychologist, also testified during the December 4, 1998, hearing. Dr. O'Keefe had evaluated the children in 1994 and had listened to the testimony in the courtroom on December 4, 1998. Based upon the testimony in that December 4, 1998, hearing, Dr. O'Keefe opined that any contact with the parents at that time would be detrimental to the children's transition into foster care and potential adoptive placement. He testified that the problems the children appeared to be experiencing in 1998 were identical to those he had encountered with the children during his 1994 examination, in which he had found that each child was "mildly retarded" and was suffering from "attention deficit disorder." Dr. O'Keefe further opined that whether or not post-termination visitation was appropriate depended upon whether the children were to be adopted. If adoption was a real possibility, he indicated that he would not be opposed to post-adoption visitation but would oppose visitation pending adoption. If the permanency plan for the children was permanent foster care, Dr. O'Keefe indicated that he would not be opposed to visitation and that specialized care would be capable of managing the children's reactive behaviors arising from visitation with their parents.

The lower court subsequently entered an order, dated December 29, 1998, terminating the parental rights of the parents See footnote 8 to Billy Joe and Jason and indicating that visitation was not in the best interests of the children and should not take place "at this time." The court further indicated that "the possibility of visitation for the infants and their parents" would be addressed during a custody review hearing scheduled for March 1, 1999.See footnote 9 The Petition for Appeal to this Court was thereafter filed.

The Appellants do not appeal the adjudication of neglect or the termination of parental rights. Their sole issue on appeal is the lower court's denial of post-termination visitation. The Appellants maintain that the close parent-child emotional bond compels the conclusion that post-termination visitation is warranted. The DHHR contends, however, that post-termination visitation is not in the best interests of the children and would in fact be detrimental to them. The DHHR maintains that the lower court properly recognized the emotional bond between the parents and the children, as well as the fact that the children desired to reside with their parents, but concluded, based upon the testimony of Dr. O'Keefe and Mr. Abbott, that post-termination visitation would be detrimental to the children and would not be in their best interests at the time of the hearing on December 4, 1998. The lower court did not, however, exclude the possibility of future visitation.

II. Standard of Review

We have expressed our applicable standard of review in abuse and neglect cases as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.
>
> Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

III. Post-termination Visitation

This Court has previously acknowledged that post-termination visitation See footnote 10 may be appropriate under certain circumstances and has explained as follows:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

We also expressed the superiority of the rights of the children in syllabus point three of In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), explaining that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." In State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996), we explained that post-termination visitation should be permitted if it is in the children's best interest and "would not unreasonably interfere with their permanent placement." Id. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. Such determination of whether the post-termination visitation would interfere with the children's permanent placement indicates the necessity for the formulation of a permanency plan prior to the decision regarding post-termination visitation.

Unfortunately for these children, their case was fraught with difficulties long before the commencement of the visitation issue which is now before this Court. The children have been left with the parents for a lengthy period of time, indeed all the formative years of their lives, and have formed a close emotional bond with their parents. Now they are being "rescued" into an uncertain future - no permanent placement and no one definitely committed to them. See footnote 11 Where allegations of neglect See footnote 12 are made against parents based on intellectual incapacity of such parent(s) and their consequent inability to adequately care for their children, termination of rights should occur only after the social services systemSee footnote 13 [13] makes a thorough effort to determine whether the parent(s) can adequately care for the children with intensive long-term assistance. In such case, however, the determination of whether the parents can function with such assistance should be made as soon as possible in order to maximize the child(ren)'s chances for a permanent placement. See footnote 14 According to the evidence of record, the children in the present case have developed an intense emotional bond with their parents, making separation excruciatingly painful for the children and the parents. Additionally, as the children have become older, their likelihood of being placed in adoptive homes has decreased, further prejudicing their chances for permanency.

We have previously discussed the need for concurrent planning. Concurrent planning, wherein a permanent placement plan for the child(ren) in the event reunification with the family is unsuccessful is developed contemporaneously with reunification efforts, is in the best interests of children in abuse and neglect proceedings. See footnote 15 Implementation of concurrent planning See footnote 16 would have been beneficial to these children, permitting continued services to the family in an effort to maintain family unity while also planning an alternative resolution should such services be unsuccessful. If such concurrent planning had been effectuated, two very essential results may have occurred: (1) the children may have been more immediately placed in permanent foster or adoptive homes subsequent to termination; and (2) specifically relevant to the issue squarely before us, the lower court could legitimately have made a finding regarding whether post-termination visitation was in the best interest of the children, with specific reference to a definitive permanent custody arrangement. Thus, a permanency plan for abused and neglected children designating their permanent placement should generally be established prior to a determination of whether post-termination visitation is appropriate. Where children have a substantial emotional bond with their parents, the termination of parental rights based upon intellectual incapacity of parents and denial of post-termination visitation, without any definitive permanent plan in place, is tantamount to throwing the children out of the frying pan into the fire.

In the present case, based primarily upon the parents' intellectual incapacity, the needs of the children have not been met, and the resulting living conditions constitute neglect. However, the social services and legal systems have left these children with their parents for eleven and twelve years, with resultant strong emotional bonds. In such circumstances, the emotional bonds between the parents and child(ren) should be closely evaluated to determine the appropriate course of action. We therefore remand this matter for implementation of permanency plans and additional evaluation regarding the potential for successful post-termination visitation, both after the permanency plans are implemented and in the interim.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989). Mr. M. is presently sixty-one years of age, functioning at approximately the fourth percentile for IQ scores in the United States, with a fourth grade education. His employment has reportedly been very sporadic. Mrs. M is forty-two years of age, with a second-grade education and no history of employment. She functions at approximately the first percentile for IQ scores in the United States.*

Footnote: 2 Billy Joe was born on October 14, 1987, and Jason was born on July 24, 1986. Both children have been diagnosed as mildly mentally retarded.

Footnote: 3 The case plans for both Billy Joe and Jason indicate the need for specialized foster care pending attempted adoptive placement.

Footnote: 4 Allegations of abuse and neglect, in the form of inadequate supervision of the children and maintenance of their physical surroundings, had previously been filed in Braxton County in February 1994, and the children were removed from the parental home from March 1994 through June 1995.See footnote 17 Subsequent to improvement periods, Billy Joe and Jason were returned to their parents' care in June 1995. The parents repeatedly cleaned their home in an attempt to regain custody of the children but would then permit the same unsanitary conditions to reoccur. The children were again removed in August 1995 and returned in January 1996. Parental rights to the youngest son, James, were terminated by the Circuit Court of Braxton County on August 14, 1998. James is not a subject of this appeal from the Nicholas County order. As noted by the lower court, the Braxton County Circuit Court provided little reasoning for permitting Billy Joe and Jason to return to their parents, while terminating the parental rights to the youngest son, James, explaining only that the older children were more capable of caring for themselves.

Footnote: 5 The petition asserted that the West Virginia DHHR has an extensive history with the family, beginning in Jefferson County on December 15, 1986, at the time Jason was five months of age and services were opened for child protective services to monitor neglect issues. The petition indicated that Action Youth Care had provided basic needs assistance, parenting skills, family preservation services, hygiene and housekeeping skills and access to community resources in Jefferson County from February 1992 through August 1993. Braxton County DHHR initiated family services in August 1993 when the family moved to Braxton County, providing parenting, budgeting, nutritional counseling, grocery shopping supervision, and basic child care training. Well Spring Family Services provided assistance in Nicholas County from August 1994 through November 1996.

Footnote: 6 The lower court found that the Braxton County DHHR had provided services to this family prior to the 1995 petition filed in Braxton County. The lower court recounted the myriad of services provided to this family in Braxton County, including parent training, budgeting skills training, grocery shopping, homemaking, hygiene, basic child care, in-home services from Florence Crittenton Center, and in-home services from the Daily Living organization.

Footnote: 7 Jason was placed in HCA Riverpark Hospital, and Billy Joe was placed in Highland Hospital in Charleston. Jason had been hospitalized based upon suicide threats, threatening to jump off a moving school bus, and threatening to jump off a high porch at his foster parents' home. Upon learning of Jason's hospitalization, Billy Joe became distraught, informed his foster parents that he was running away, and rode a bicycle down the middle of a highway. After discharge, both boys were placed in specialized foster homes through Action Youth Care in Wayne County.

Footnote: 8 The lower court found that there was no reasonable likelihood that the parents could substantially correct the existing conditions of neglect, based upon (1) the fact that the parents suffered from "mental deficiency of such duration as to render. . . [them] incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiency improving the adequacy of such skills;" (2) the long history of services offered to the family, resulting in little or no improvement. The lower court recounted the services offered since 1994 through the DHHR, Florence Crittenton Center, Action Youth Care, and counseling with Seneca Mental Health and Health Transitions; and (3) the mental deficiencies of the parents as reflected in multiple psychological evaluations finding both parents functioning with IQs in the low 60s, with little ability to handle the financial affairs or the child rearing issues of the family.

Footnote: 9 By the March 1999 hearing, the Petition for Appeal to this Court had been filed. The lower court heard the testimony of Nancy Conner of child protective services, indicating that the boys were progressing well in foster care, and delayed any further decisions regarding visitation until this Court issued its decision on the petition for appeal.

Footnote: 10 The right to post-termination visitation is a right of the child, not the parent. In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, ___, 460 S.E.2d 692, ___ n.9. It is the right of the child to continued association with those with whom he shares an emotional bond which governs the decision.

Footnote: 11 Although counsel on oral argument represented that he believed the current foster placement might result in a permanent placement, there was nothing in the record to definitively support this potential.

Footnote: 12 Where the charge is abuse as opposed to neglect, the obligation to provide remedial services is far less substantial.

Footnote: 13 By reference to the social services system, we include not only the DHHR, but also the myriad of other service agencies charged with providing services to families, including those agencies providing services to this family, as listed in footnotes five and eight. These include private, non-profit agencies such as Action Youth Care which receive referrals from DHHR, hospitals, schools, and private psychologists.

Footnote: 14 It is axiomatic that the older children become and the more troubled they become, the more difficult it is to find adoptive homes.

Footnote: 15 In In re Lilley, 719 A.2d 327 (Pa.Super. 1998), the following explanation of new federal legislation was provided:

On November 19, 1997 President Clinton signed the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997 (ASFA), Public Law 105-89, [42 U.S.C. 675(5)(C)] which amends the Titles IV- B and IV-E of the Social Security Act. ASFA establishes unequivocally that the goals for children in the child welfare system are safety, permanency and well-being. The law intends to make the child welfare system more responsive to the multiple, frequently complex, needs of children and their families. While affirming the need to forge linkage between the child welfare system and other support systems for families, the child welfare system and the courts, the law reaffirms the need to assure the safety and well-being of children and their families. The law provides renewed impetus to dismantling the barriers to permanence existing for children in placement and the need for permanency for these children. ASFA embodies several key principles that must be considered in implementing the law:

. The child's safety is the paramount concern. All decisions made must be based on the child's safety and well-being.

. Substitute care is a temporary setting. It is not a place for children to grow up. For children who cannot safely return home, the law provides for an expedited process to find these children permanent homes.

. Permanency planning for children begins as soon as the child enters substitute care. From the time a child enters placement, the agency must be diligent in finding a permanent family for the child.

. The practice of concurrent planning is encouraged by ASFA to facilitate finding a permanent home for a child in a timely manner.

. Achieving permanency for children requires timely decisions from all elements of the child serving system.

. Innovative approaches are needed to produce change. The law envisions real change in the child welfare program.

Rule 28 of the Rules of Abuse and Neglect Proceedings requires the DHHR to prepare the child's case plan. The following information should comprise a part of that case plan:

(c) When the Department's recommendation includes placement of the child away from home, whether temporarily or permanently, the report also shall include:

(1) An explanation why the child cannot be protected from the identified problems in the home even with the provision of service or why placement in the home is not in the best interest of the child;

(2) Identification of relatives or friends who were contacted about providing a suitable and safe permanent placement for the child;

(3) A description of the recommended placement or type of home or institutional placement in which the child is to be placed, including its distance from the child's home and whether or not it is the least restrictive (most family-like) one available and including a discussion of the appropriateness of the placement and how the agency which is responsible for the child plans to assure that the child receives proper care and that services are provided to the parents, child and foster parents in order to improve the conditions in the parent's(s')/respondent's('s) home, facilitate return of the child to his or her own home, or the permanent placement of the child;

(4) A suggested visitation plan including an explanation of any conditions be placed on the visits;

(5) A statement of the child's special needs and the ways they should be met while in placement;

(6) The location of any siblings and, if siblings are separated, a statement of the reasons for the separation and the steps required to unite them as quickly as possible and to maintain regular contact during the separation if it is in the child's best interest . . . .

Per Curiam:
This case is before this Court upon an appeal from the final order of the Circuit Court of Cabell County, West Virginia, entered on March 15, 1996. The case concerns the alleged abuse and neglect of four children by the names of Angelina C., April C., Ryan C. and Randy C. See footnote 1The appellant, Billy Lee C., contends that the circuit court committed error in terminating his parental rights to the children. The appellee, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, however, contends that, in terminating the appellant's parental rights, the circuit court ruled correctly and in a manner protective of the health and welfare of the children.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and the briefs of counsel. For the reasons stated below, the final order of the circuit court is affirmed.

I

As in many such cases, the facts herein are grievous. The appellant and Margaret Ann C., his wife, are the natural parents of four children: Angelina (born on April 24, 1988), April (born on April 15, 1989), Ryan (born on January 8, 1991) and Randy (born on October 29, 1992). Unfortunately, as the marriage continued, the home environment, particularly with regard to the children, became less and less stable. For example, the record indicates that both parents drank alcohol and smoked marijuana in the presence of the children. According to psychologist, Paul Mulder, the appellant, in particular, acknowledged the "regular use of alcohol or marijuana." Moreover, the record indicates that the appellant engaged in domestic violence against Margaret Ann C. In one instance, he allegedly kicked Margaret Ann C. in the stomach while she was pregnant, necessitating medical treatment.

In addition, poor hygiene and inadequate clothing of the children and frequent absences of the children from school were problems. Moreover, the appellant and Margaret Ann C. ultimately separated, and the children lived with both parents at various times. The appellant's employment included working as an assistant manager of a fast food restaurant, and Margaret Ann C.'s employment included working as an exotic dancer. The record indicates that as a result of the separation of the appellant and Margaret Ann C., and as a result of their respective working hours, the children were often exposed to other individuals who, in themselves, brought the well-being of the children into question. In one instance, Robert B., a male companion of Margaret Ann C., allegedly battered Angelina. In fact, Robert B. had such a negative impact upon the children, generally, that Margaret Ann C. was ordered by the circuit court to avoid having the children in his presence. Moreover, Angelina C. stated that the appellant's friends beat her, and she indicated that, on one occasion, one of the appellant's friends intentionally burned her with a cigarette. Furthermore, the record indicates that, while under the care of the appellant in April 1994, Angelina was allegedly sexually assaulted by the son of a baby sitter. With regard to the latter instance, although the medical evidence revealed that Angelina "had a laceration in her vagina and redness and bleeding" and a police report was filed, no charges were ever brought as a result of the allegation.

The circumstances resulting in this proceeding arose in December, 1994. On December 19, 1994, the Department of Health and Human Resources, with the assistance of the Cabell County Prosecuting Attorney, filed an emergency petition in the circuit court seeking immediate custody of the children and termination of the parental rights of the appellant and Margaret Ann C. The petition indicated that Angelina (then age 6), April (then age 5), Ryan (then age 3) and Randy (then age 2) were abused and neglected children. See W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994], and W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1992]. Specifically, the petition alleged that the appellant had performed oral sex upon April C.

Upon review of the petition, the circuit court awarded temporary custody of the children to the Department and appointed a guardian ad litem upon the children's behalf. Soon after, the circuit court named a Court Appointed Special Advocate (CASA) for the children, appointed counsel for the appellant and Margaret Ann C. and scheduled a preliminary hearing. See W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1992]. The children were placed in a foster home in Wayne County, West Virginia. At the conclusion of the preliminary hearing, conducted in January, 1995, the circuit court stated: "[T]here is enough evidence to demonstrate there is probable cause that some form of sexual abuse and/or assault has occurred against [April C.] at the hands of [the appellant]."

In March, 1996, a final adjudicatory hearing was conducted by the circuit court, and the witnesses included Lisa Bailey and Brenda Wright. Lisa Bailey was April C.'s preschool teacher for Cabell County schools, and Brenda Wright was a child protective service worker employed by the Department. Ms. Bailey, who had testified at the preliminary hearing, again stated that, on December 15, 1994, while at school, April C. went in and out of the bathroom several times. On the last occasion, Ms. Bailey accompanied April C. to the bathroom. Then, as Ms. Bailey testified:

[April] pulled up her pants and she went ahead and washed her hands. And she kept putting her hands between her legs. She had done that frequently all day. And she said 'Hurt' again. And I asked her, I said, 'April, what hurts?' You know, I asked her, 'What hurts?' And she kept putting her hand between her legs. And she said, 'Hurt. Daddy hurt. Daddy eat me.' And I wasn't sure at that time what exactly she was saying. And I said, 'What?' And I was questioning her. And she repeated it. And I said, 'What does Daddy do?' And she patted herself on the crotch, and she said, 'Daddy put his head down here.'

Brenda Wright, who had also testified at the preliminary hearing, stated that she was present with April C. in the emergency room of Cabell Huntington Hospital immediately after the incident related by Ms. Bailey. As she testified at the preliminary hearing, Ms. Wright again indicated that she understood April to say at the hospital: "Daddy eat me." Furthermore, as Ms. Wright testified:

> Q. Were you present, I think you testified, during the physical examination of April by Dr. Lehman?
> A. Yes. . . . She was highly upset about the exam. We had a terrible time getting the exam over with. There was some redness and irritation in the vaginal area. And, yes, there was a strong odor.

A number of other witnesses testified at the final adjudicatory hearing including Huntington, West Virginia, police officer Kendra Clark, who described the police report concerning the alleged sexual assault of Angelina C. in April 1994, and Elizabeth Brachna, a family services counselor, who stated that both Angelina and April exhibited the "behavioral and psychological profile of a sexually abused child." Moreover, during the hearing, the circuit court conducted an in camera proceeding during which the court interviewed Angelina C. and April C. It was during that hearing that Angelina C. indicated that the appellant's friends beat her. The appellant, who has denied the allegations of December, 1994, throughout this litigation, and who maintains that he was protective of his children, did not testify at the final adjudicatory hearing.

Following the final adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court entered the order of March 15, 1996. In terminating the appellant's parental rights, the final order stated:

> The respondent children were abused and neglected as those terms are defined in the West Virginia Code by both respondent parents, and both respondent parents failed to protect the respondent children while said children were in the custody of either respondent parent. The testimony herein provides clear and convincing evidence to the Court that not once, but on a number of occasions, these children were abused and neglected. . . . With regard to the respondent father, [the appellant], there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future.

As reflected in the final order, Margaret Ann C., was granted an improvement period concerning the children. The improvement period, however, was unsuccessful, and by order entered on September 12, 1996, the parental rights of Margaret Ann C. to the children were also terminated. The latter order is not contested in this appeal and is, therefore, not before this Court. See footnote 2

The appellant contends that the circuit court committed error in terminating his parental rights to the children. In that regard, he argues that the Department failed to establish by clear and convincing evidence (1) that he abused April C., (2) that his conduct toward the children, generally, could not be substantially corrected and (3) that he failed to protect the children from others. As stated above, the appellant denied the allegations of December, 1994 and maintains that he was protective of his children. The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, however, contends that the circuit court ruled correctly and in a manner protective of the health and welfare of the children.

In syllabus point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court observed:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or > neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

See also syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S., 197 W. Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996).

An "abused child" is defined in W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994], as a child who is harmed or threatened by "[a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" In addition, W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994], defines a "neglected child" as a child who is harmed or threatened "by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian [.]"

In particular, with regard to the termination of parental rights, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1992], provides that a circuit court may:

> [u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental or custodial rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency.

Moreover, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1992], provides:

> As used in this section, 'no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected' shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be > deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:

>
> (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning [.]
> . . . .
> (5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, or have sexually abused or sexually exploited the child, and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child [.]

The above provisions of W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1992], are similar to the 1977 version of that statute, which this Court cited in In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). In syllabus point 2 of In re R.J.M., this Court held:

> Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. VA. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. VA. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

See also syl. pt. 1, In re Brianna Elizabeth M., 192 W. Va. 363, 452 S.E.2d 454 (1994).

The In re R.J.M. case was subsequently cited by this Court in In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993). In In re Jeffrey R.L., we held in syllabus point 3:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

See also syl. pt. 2, In re Danielle T., 195 W. Va. 530, 466 S.E.2d 189 (1995), holding that parental rights should be terminated where a child had been burned and subjected to malnutrition.

In the case now before us, the final order made clear that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources established by "clear and convincing evidence" that Angelina C., April C., Ryan C. and Randy C. were abused and neglected children. Moreover, the final order specifically stated that, with regard to the appellant, "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future." Based upon a careful review of the record, this Court is of the opinion that, under the standard of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S. set forth above, the findings of the circuit court were not "clearly erroneous." With regard to the likelihood of correcting the conditions of abuse and neglect in the future, for instance, Dr. Mulder indicated as follows, concerning the appellant's use of alcohol and marijuana: "[G]iven the fact that [the appellant] does not perceive his level of alcohol and drug use to be a problem, it's questionable how much impact educational counseling will have. There is no evidence that [the appellant] would benefit substantially from psychiatric treatment or long-term psychological counseling."

Here, the allegations that the appellant sexually abused or assaulted April C. in December, 1994 were substantiated by Lisa Bailey, April C.'s preschool teacher, and Brenda Wright, a child protective service worker employed by the Department. Although the record before us does not include the medical records relating to that incident, Ms. Wright, who was present at the hospital when April C. was examined, described April C. as having "redness and irritation in the vaginal area."

Even in view of the appellant's denial of the incident of December, 1994, however, the record contains significant evidence of other circumstances of abuse and neglect of the children. As stated above, the appellant acknowledged the regular use of alcohol and marijuana, and the appellant engaged in domestic violence against Margaret Ann C. As this Court recognized in Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. VA. 710, 713-14, 356 S.E.2d 464, 467-68 (1987), such problems are relevant considerations with regard to the welfare of children in the home. See W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b)(1) [1992]. Moreover, it is particularly disturbing that the record suggests that both the appellant and Margaret Ann C. routinely left the children with others who, in themselves, brought the well-being of the children into question. In fact, Angelina C. may have been beaten, burned with a cigarette and even sexually assaulted, while in the appellant's care. As family services counselor Elizabeth Brachna testified, generally, at the final adjudicatory hearing: "I find it very disturbing that the children have been exposed to this many situations and people."

In the recent case of In re Katie S., ___ W. Va. ___, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), this Court, in syllabus point 3, held: "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Here, this Court is of the opinion that the circuit court's ruling, terminating the appellant's parental rights to Angelina C., April C., Ryan C. and Randy C., was protective of the health and welfare of the children. Accordingly, the final order of the Circuit Court of Cabell County, entered on March 15, 1996, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 We follow our practice in domestic relations cases involving sensitive matters and use initials to identify the parties, rather than full names. In the matter of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 303 n. 1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n. 1 (1989).

Footnote:2 In granting this appeal, this Court noted that the appellant, in his petition, asserted that his right to equal protection of the laws was violated because the final order of March 15, 1996, terminated his parental rights to the children but did not terminate the parental rights of Margaret Ann C. As stated above, however, the parental rights of Margaret Ann C. were later terminated. Consequently, the appellant's contention concerning equal protection is moot.

The record demonstrates that, at best, the relationship of Margaret Ann C. to her children was progressively troubled. As stated above, both parents drank alcohol and smoked marijuana in the presence of the children. Robert B., a subsequent male companion of Margaret Ann C., allegedly battered Angelina, and, in fact, Margaret Ann C. was ordered by the circuit court to avoid having the children in his presence. According to the record, Margaret Ann C. violated that order. Moreover, in addition to the allegations concerning the babysitter's son, relating to the appellant, the record also contains assertions that Angelina may have been sexually molested by male babysitters utilized by Margaret Ann C. One witness described Angelina as indicating that those baby sitters were friends of Robert B, "who was mother's boy friend, who was not supposed to be in the home at that time."

Although the children were largely in foster care throughout the proceedings below, they were returned to Margaret Ann C. more than once, only to be returned again to foster care. On one occasion in 1996, the children were returned to the Department, and to foster care, at Margaret Ann C.'s request. Furthermore,

Margaret Ann C.'s exercise of her visitation rights with the children, during the proceedings below, was sporadic.

Footnote: 6 We are greatly troubled by the complete absence of the guardian ad litem during the course of this appeal. In Michael M., this Court underscored that "guardians ad litem have a duty to fully represent the interests of their child wards at all stages of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings, both in the circuit court and on appeal." ___W.Va. at ___, 504 S.E.2d at 183 n.11. The guardian ad litem totally disregarded this Court's mandate as set forth in Michael M.

Footnote: 7 West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 was amended in 1998, but the amendment does not affect this decision.

Footnote: 8 As this Court has previously held, "[t]he standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof." Syl. Pt. 6, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

Footnote: 9 Any disposition must, of course, also comport with West Virginia Code § 49-6-5.

Footnote: 10 Since the Appellant was represented by an attorney when she signed the agreed order, it seems likely that she was informed of her right to a disposition hearing but elected to execute the agreed order and thereby obviate the need for a full blown hearing.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia
Georgia BOARMAN, Plaintiff Below, Appellee,
v.
Raymond T. BOARMAN, Defendant Below, Appellant,
Department of Health and Human Resources, Intervenor.
No. 21814
Submitted Oct. 5, 1993
Decided Dec. 15, 1993

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Rule 34(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law provides that where there have been allegations of abuse or neglect, the family law master or circuit judge may, sua sponte or on motion of either party, order an investigation or home study of one or both of the parties. Further, Rule 34(b) provides that when a family law master of circuit judge finds that a child has been neglected or abused, the family law master or circuit judge shall report the abuse in accordance with the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6A-2 (1992 & Supp.1993).

2. When serious allegations of child abuse or neglect are made in a custody case, the family law master and circuit judge should direct the Department of Health and Human Resources to intervene and conduct home studies and the court should make full inquiry into these allegations. Furthermore, where serious allegations of abuse and neglect arise, the protections afforded children under abuse and neglect law should apply.

3. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

4. "In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social services workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

5. "The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Thomas M. Woodward, Deputy Atty. Gen., Charleston, for Department of Health and Human Resources.

WORKMAN, Chief Justice:

This is an appeal by Raymond Lee Boarman from an October 16, 1992, final order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County granting custody of six of the parties' seven children to the Appellee and former wife of the Appellant, Georgia Boarman. The Appellant contends that the lower court erred in awarding custody to the children's mother and requests this Court to reverse the decision of the lower court. Finding that insufficient evidence has been gathered in this egregious custody matter, we remand this for additional proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

While no custody dispute can properly be classified as normal or ordinary, the present case is one of the most troublesome custody matters we have recently encountered. The Appellee filed a divorce complaint on January 29, 1990, in the Circuit Court of Berkeley County, and the Appellant's answer was filed on February 20, 1990. Both parties sought custody of the seven children born of the marriage, namely Raymond Boarman (December 27, 1978), Brix Boarman (October 27, 1980), Betty Boarman (November 4, 1981), Reinhold Boarman (November 15, 1982), Reich Boarman (November 22, 1983), Misty Boarman (November 18, 1986), and Charles Boarman (November 15, 1989).

The parties were granted a divorce on December 7, 1990, and the temporary custody issue was addressed on December 11, 1990. At that hearing, the family law master interviewed the two oldest children, Raymond (age 11) and Brix (age 10), in order to ascertain their custody preferences. The Appellant now complains that the family law master failed to administer any oath to the boys and failed to instruct them as to the importance of telling the truth. The boys informed the family law master that they desired to live with their mother. They further related incidents involving the father's alleged threats to the children and the father's shooting of cats at a family barbecue. Although Brix admitted that his mother had suggested that he use the term "supervised visitation" during the interview when referring to the type of visitation he desired with his father, the family law master apparently failed to inquire further into possible rehearsal or preparation of the boys for this interview. Based upon this interview with the two children, the family law master granted temporary custody to the mother with visitation to the father.

A final custody hearing was held on August 29, 1991, and the mother was determined to be the primary caretaker. The evidence adduced at this hearing was extensive and included testimony of the parents, babysitters, family members, neighbors, school personnel, and teachers. Witnesses for the father testified that the mother frequently verbally abuses the children, calling them various names. She later admitted to using the term asshole, but denied use of any other degrading language in reference to the children. Mr. and Mrs. Robert Palczynski, neighbors of the mother in New York, testified that the mother verbally abused the children, did not provide adequate clothing for the children in the winter months, and allowed them to catch mice and place them in the microwave until they exploded. The twelve-year-old son of the Palczynskis testified that he had played with the Boarman children and had been threatened by their mother. He had witnessed the placement of the mice in the microwave, and he further testified that the children were permitted to play with knives and sticks and were permitted to watch pornographic films. He had personally witnessed an incident in which the children had observed their mother in bed with a man. See footnote 1

Evidence by the father's witnesses also included allegations that the mother failed to cook properly for the children, failed to clean the living quarters, allowed the children to use profanity, failed to remove feces from the children when changing diapers, drank straight whiskey in the morning hours while caring for the children, and had sexual relations in the presence of the children.

The witnesses for the mother testified that the father conveyed social and political ideas to his children which included the belief that Jews and Negroes should be killed and that Adolph Hitler's political principles were laudable. See footnote 2 Testimony for the mother also included allegations that the father shot at cows in an attempt to change their direction and that he loses his temper easily and threatens to physically harm the children. The father denied shooting at cows but admitted that he had shot at cats because he thought they might have rabies. However, he denied having shot cats which were his children's pets.

Several witnesses for the mother also testified that her habits in her new location in New York were excellent and that she was an outstanding example of a single parent. A school psychologist from the children's school in New York testified that the mother was very cooperative and responsive to the needs of the children. The mother admitted that she had a drinking problem in the past, but assured the court that it had been corrected. She further admitted that the oldest boy preferred to live with his father.

The family law master then examined the oldest child of the parties. He testified that the mother's house in New York was not nice and that he had previously testified to things that were untrue. He further stated that his mother had paid the children for being good in court, and that his mother would frequently keep him home from school to babysit the other children.

Based upon the testimony at the final custody hearing, the family law master recommended that the mother be awarded custody of the six youngest children and the father be awarded custody of the oldest child. Each party contended that the other party was unfit for custody. On October 16, 1992, the Circuit Court of Berkeley County entered the final custody order, approving the findings of the family law master without further hearing.

II.

Upon appeal to this Court, it appeared that these serious allegations of abuse and neglect had never been examined, and we consequently ordered home studies of both the mother's home in New York and the father's home in West Virginia. A report on the father's home was filed with this Court on September 30, 1993, and a report on the mother's home was filed on October 1, 1993. See footnote 3 The home study conducted on the father's home indicated that the Appellant, age 61, is employed by General Motors. Raymond Boarman, currently in the ninth grade at Hedgesville High School, has been residing with his father since April 1992. The report indicated that the Appellant seemed open and honest and resided in a two-story farm house in a rural area of the county. The home appeared to be in good repair and the housekeeping standards were deemed acceptable. The social service worker concluded that the Appellant seemed to have adequate financial resources, housing, and space to provide for the needs of all seven children. The worker recognized that due to the seriousness of the accusations against the Appellant with regard to his care of the children, the primary concern should be for the emotional well-being of the children. Psychological evaluations were recommended.

The home study performed on the mother's home in New York indicated that the Appellee was very cooperative and appeared open and honest. The Appellee was not working at the time of the study, but she apparently indicated that she hoped to find work within a few weeks. The family is presently living on food stamps and Medicaid assistance. Although the Appellant apparently owes child support, the Appellee indicated that she was not receiving any payments. The social service worker concluded that the Appellee was an extremely well- motivated single parent. Other individuals interviewed by the worker described the Appellee as very involved with the children, able to effectively deal with problems the children might encounter, nurturing, and caring. The final recommendation was that the children presently in their mother's care remain with her.

On September 30, 1993, prior to its receipt of the home study of the mother's home, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("the Department"), as an intervenor party to this action, See footnote 4 recommended that this case be remanded to the family law master for further proceedings, that the Department continue to remain a party to the action, that the children be appointed a guardian ad litem, that a psychological evaluation be performed on both parents and the children, and that the lower court make a finding as to each significant allegation that would impact the welfare of the children. Upon review of this matter, we agree with the Department's conclusions and remand this matter for initiation of orders and proceedings outlined above.

With regard to our request for intervention of the department, we remind the circuit courts and family law masters that Rule 34(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law (effective October 1993) provides that where there have been allegations of abuse or neglect, "the family law master or circuit judge may, sua sponte or on motion of either party, order an investigation or home study of one or both of the parties." Further, Rule 34(b) provides that "[w]hen a family law master or circuit judge finds that a child has been neglected or abused, the family law master or circuit judge shall report the abuse in accordance with the provisions of chapter 49, article 6A, section 2 of the Code of West Virginia."

Where serious allegations of abuse or neglect are made in a child custody case, the family law master and circuit judge should direct the department to intervene and conduct home studies and the court should make full inquiry into these allegations. Furthermore, when serious allegations of abuse or neglect arise, the protections afforded children under abuse and neglect law should apply.

The Appellant's primary assignments of error related to his contention that the Appellee was unfit to gain custody of the children. Obviously, due to our decision to remand, that issue need not be addressed at this juncture. With regard to his contention that the lower court erred by examining the two older children in camera during the temporary custody hearing without administering an oath, we find no merit to the position of the Appellant. First, the Appellant would have great difficulty convincing this Court that any irregularity in the administration of oaths or the lack of oaths at the temporary hearing prejudiced his rights in any manner. Moreover, the family law master's decision to grant temporary custody to the mother, while based in large part on the testimony of which the Appellant now complains, was not even the final decision regarding custody. Under these circumstances, we find no error in the failure of the family law master to administer an oath to the children.

We remain deeply concerned that something here is awry. We cannot abandon the question of these children's well-being without further inquiry into this situation. We have previously recognized the following:

> Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 615, 408 S.E.2d 365, 367 (1991). In syllabus point 4 of Carlita, we explained the following:

> In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social services workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.

Id. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368.

Finally, in syllabus point 5 of Carlita, we stated:

> The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

Id.

This matter will be remanded for further proceedings consistent with the recommendations of the Department, with the assistance of the Department continuing until resolution of this matter is accomplished. Furthermore, we direct the Department to expedite this case which has already languished too long in the judicial and social service systems to the detriment of the children involved. See footnote 5 Similarly, we instruct the circuit court that these allegations of neglect and abuse must be examined and resolved. On remand, the circuit court should appoint a guardian ad litem for the children and develop an expeditious schedule for ensuing proceedings. At the conclusion of the proceedings, which should be no more than six months, the circuit court shall file its findings of fact and conclusions of law with this Court, and we will undertake further consideration of this appeal at that time.

Remanded for further proceedings.

Footnote: 1 It should be noted that Georgia Boarman alleged that her former husband had paid the Palczynskis for their negative testimony against her. When questioned regarding that allegation, Mr. Boarman explained that he had provided them with travel money to drive from New York to Martinsburg, West Virginia, but had not otherwise compensated them for their testimony.

Footnote: 2 The father later explained that he thought Adolph Hitler had some good ideas and some bad ones and explained that Hitler's ideas were good from a military standpoint.

Footnote: 3 Amazingly, both the home study conducted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources on the father in Martinsburg and the study conducted by the Broome County Department of Social Services on the mother in New York characterize these parents in almost glowing terms.

Footnote: 4 We note that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources was directed by this Court to intervene in this matter.

Footnote: 5 We note that on oral argument of this matter, counsel for the Department appeared less than adequately briefed on the status of this case. While it may be unfair to blame the particular lawyer involved, who maintained that the file had been handed to her only a few days before the hearing, we cannot tolerate such a dilatory effort on the part of the Department as a whole. We reemphasize to the Department that they must meet their responsibilities in such matters in a thorough and expeditious manner.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia
Georgia BOARMAN, Plaintiff Below, Appellee,
v.
Raymond T. BOARMAN, Defendant Below, Appellant,
Department of Health and Human Resources, Intervenor.
No. 21814
Submitted Oct. 5, 1993
Decided Dec. 15, 1993

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Rule 34(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law provides that where there have been allegations of abuse or neglect, the family law master or circuit judge may, sua sponte or on motion of either party, order an investigation or home study of one or both of the parties. Further, Rule 34(b) provides that when a family law master of circuit judge finds that a child has been neglected or abused, the family law master or circuit judge shall report the abuse in accordance with the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6A-2 (1992 & Supp.1993).

2. When serious allegations of child abuse or neglect are made in a custody case, the family law master and circuit judge should direct the Department of Health and Human Resources to intervene and conduct home studies and the court should make full inquiry into these allegations. Furthermore, where serious allegations of abuse and neglect arise, the protections afforded children under abuse and neglect law should apply.

3. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

4. "In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social services workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

5. "The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

WORKMAN, Chief Justice:

This is an appeal by Raymond Lee Boarman from an October 16, 1992, final order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County granting custody of six of the parties' seven children to the Appellee and former wife of the Appellant, Georgia Boarman. The Appellant contends that the lower court erred in awarding custody to the children's mother and requests this Court to reverse the decision of the lower court. Finding that insufficient evidence has been gathered in this egregious custody matter, we remand this for additional proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

While no custody dispute can properly be classified as normal or ordinary, the present case is one of the most troublesome custody matters we have recently encountered. The Appellee filed a divorce complaint on January 29, 1990, in the Circuit Court of Berkeley County, and the Appellant's answer was filed on February 20, 1990. Both parties sought custody of the seven children born of the marriage, namely Raymond Boarman (December 27, 1978), Brix Boarman (October 27, 1980), Betty Boarman (November 4, 1981), Reinhold Boarman (November 15, 1982), Reich Boarman (November 22, 1983), Misty Boarman (November 18, 1986), and Charles Boarman (November 15, 1989).

The parties were granted a divorce on December 7, 1990, and the temporary custody issue was addressed on December 11, 1990. At that hearing, the family law master interviewed the two oldest children, Raymond (age 11) and Brix (age 10), in order to ascertain their custody preferences. The Appellant now complains that the family law master failed to administer any oath to the boys and failed to instruct them as to the importance of telling the truth. The boys informed the family law master that they desired to live with their mother. They further related incidents involving the father's alleged threats to the children and the father's shooting of cats at a family barbecue. Although Brix admitted that his mother had suggested that he use the term "supervised visitation" during the interview when referring to the type of visitation he desired with his father, the family law master apparently failed to inquire further into possible rehearsal or preparation of the boys for this interview. Based upon this interview with the two children, the family law master granted temporary custody to the mother with visitation to the father.

A final custody hearing was held on August 29, 1991, and the mother was determined to be the primary caretaker. The evidence adduced at this hearing was extensive and included testimony of the parents, babysitters, family members, neighbors, school personnel, and teachers. Witnesses for the father testified that the mother frequently verbally abuses the children, calling them various names. She later admitted to using the term asshole, but denied use of any other degrading language in reference to the children. Mr. and Mrs. Robert Palczynski, neighbors of the mother in New York, testified that the mother verbally abused the children, did not provide adequate clothing for the children in the winter months, and allowed them to catch mice and place them in the microwave until they exploded. The twelve-year-old son of the Palczynskis testified that he had played with the Boarman children and had been threatened by their mother. He had witnessed the placement of the mice in the microwave, and he further testified that the children were permitted to play with knives and sticks and were permitted to watch pornographic films. He had personally witnessed an incident in which the children had observed their mother in bed with a man. See footnote 1

Evidence by the father's witnesses also included allegations that the mother failed to cook properly for the children, failed to clean the living quarters, allowed the children to use profanity, failed to remove feces from the children when changing diapers, drank straight whiskey in the morning hours while caring for the children, and had sexual relations in the presence of the children.

The witnesses for the mother testified that the father conveyed social and political ideas to his children which included the belief that Jews and Negroes should be killed and that Adolph Hitler's political principles were laudable. See footnote 2 Testimony for the mother also included allegations that the father shot at cows in an attempt to change their direction and that he loses his temper easily and threatens to physically harm the children. The father denied shooting at cows but admitted that he had shot at cats because he thought they might have rabies. However, he denied having shot cats which were his children's pets.

Several witnesses for the mother also testified that her habits in her new location in New York were excellent and that she was an outstanding example of a single parent. A school psychologist from the children's school in New York testified that the mother was very cooperative and responsive to the needs of the children. The mother admitted that she had a drinking problem in the past, but assured the court that it had been corrected. She further admitted that the oldest boy preferred to live with his father.

The family law master then examined the oldest child of the parties. He testified that the mother's house in New York was not nice and that he had previously testified to things that were untrue. He further stated that his mother had paid the children for being good in court, and that his mother would frequently keep him home from school to babysit the other children.

Based upon the testimony at the final custody hearing, the family law master recommended that the mother be awarded custody of the six youngest children and the father be awarded custody of the oldest child. Each party contended that the other party was unfit for custody. On October 16, 1992, the Circuit Court of Berkeley County entered the final custody order, approving the findings of the family law master without further hearing.

II.

Upon appeal to this Court, it appeared that these serious allegations of abuse and neglect had never been examined, and we consequently ordered home studies of both the mother's home in New York and the father's home in West Virginia. A report on the father's home was filed with this Court on September 30, 1993, and a report on the mother's home was filed on October 1, 1993. See footnote 3 The home study conducted on the father's home indicated that the Appellant, age 61, is employed by General Motors. Raymond Boarman, currently in the ninth grade at Hedgesville High School, has been residing with his father since April 1992. The report indicated that the Appellant seemed open and honest and resided in a two-story farm house in a rural area of the county. The home appeared to be in good repair and the housekeeping standards were deemed acceptable. The social service worker concluded that the Appellant seemed to have adequate financial resources, housing, and space to provide for the needs of all seven children. The worker recognized that due to the seriousness of the accusations against the Appellant with regard to his care of the children, the primary concern should be for the emotional well-being of the children. Psychological evaluations were recommended.

The home study performed on the mother's home in New York indicated that the Appellee was very cooperative and appeared open and honest. The Appellee was not working at the time of the study, but she apparently indicated that she hoped to find work within a few weeks. The family is presently living on food stamps and Medicaid assistance. Although the Appellant apparently owes child support, the Appellee indicated that she was not receiving any payments. The social service worker concluded that the Appellee was an extremely well- motivated single parent. Other individuals interviewed by the worker described the Appellee as very involved with the children, able to effectively deal with problems the children might encounter, nurturing, and caring. The final recommendation was that the children presently in their mother's care remain with her.

On September 30, 1993, prior to its receipt of the home study of the mother's home, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("the Department"), as an intervenor party to this action, See footnote 4 recommended that this case be remanded to the family law master for further proceedings, that the Department continue to remain a party to the action, that the children be appointed a guardian ad litem, that a psychological evaluation be performed on both parents and the children, and that the lower court make a finding as to each significant allegation that would impact the welfare of the children. Upon review of this matter, we agree with the Department's conclusions and remand this matter for initiation of orders and proceedings outlined above.

With regard to our request for intervention of the department, we remind the circuit courts and family law masters that Rule 34(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law (effective October 1993) provides that where there have been allegations of abuse or neglect, "the family law master or circuit judge may, sua sponte or on motion of either party, order an investigation or home study of one or both of the parties." Further, Rule 34(b) provides that "[w]hen a family law master or circuit judge finds that a child has been neglected or abused, the family law master or circuit judge shall report the abuse in accordance with the provisions of chapter 49, article 6A, section 2 of the Code of West Virginia."

Where serious allegations of abuse or neglect are made in a child custody case, the family law master and circuit judge should direct the department to intervene and conduct home studies and the court should make full inquiry into these allegations. Furthermore, when serious allegations of abuse or neglect arise, the protections afforded children under abuse and neglect law should apply.

The Appellant's primary assignments of error related to his contention that the Appellee was unfit to gain custody of the children. Obviously, due to our decision to remand, that issue need not be addressed at this juncture. With regard to his contention that the lower court erred by examining the two older children in camera during the temporary custody hearing without administering an oath, we find no merit to the position of the Appellant. First, the Appellant would have great difficulty convincing this Court that any irregularity in the administration of oaths or the lack of oaths at the temporary hearing prejudiced his rights in any manner. Moreover, the family law master's decision to grant temporary custody to the mother, while based in large part on the testimony of which the Appellant now complains, was not even the final decision regarding custody. Under these circumstances, we find no error in the failure of the family law master to administer an oath to the children.

We remain deeply concerned that something here is awry. We cannot abandon the question of these children's well-being without further inquiry into this situation. We have previously recognized the following:

> Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 615, 408 S.E.2d 365, 367 (1991). In syllabus point 4 of Carlita, we explained the following:

> In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social services workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.

Id. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368.

Finally, in syllabus point 5 of Carlita, we stated:

> The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

Id.

This matter will be remanded for further proceedings consistent with the recommendations of the Department, with the assistance of the Department continuing until resolution of this matter is accomplished. Furthermore, we direct the Department to expedite this case which has already languished too long in the judicial and social service systems to the detriment of the children involved. See footnote 5 Similarly, we instruct the circuit court that these allegations of neglect and abuse must be examined and resolved. On remand, the circuit court should appoint a guardian ad litem for the children and develop an expeditious schedule for ensuing proceedings. At the conclusion of the proceedings, which should be no more than six months, the circuit court shall file its findings of fact and conclusions of law with this Court, and we will undertake further consideration of this appeal at that time.

Remanded for further proceedings.

Footnote: 1 It should be noted that Georgia Boarman alleged that her former husband had paid the Palczynskis for their negative testimony against her. When questioned regarding that allegation, Mr. Boarman explained that he had provided them with travel money to drive from New York to Martinsburg, West Virginia, but had not otherwise compensated them for their testimony.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Where the issue on appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syllabus Point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

2. "When a statute is clear and unambiguous and the legislative intent is plain, the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute." Syllabus Point 5, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, Veterans of Foreign Wars, 144 W.Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959).

Per Curiam:

Appellant, State of West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services ("the DHHR"), appeals from an order entered by the Circuit Court of Randolph County requiring the DHHR to pay Thomas R. Adamski, M.D. the sum of $1,000.00 for a four-hour sexual offender evaluation of Bobby Lee B., a juvenile delinquent. For the reasons set forth below, we reverse the circuit court's order.

I.

On April 19, 2004, a juvenile petition was filed charging Bobby Lee B., a fourteen-year-old child, with being a juvenile delinquent for having committed the offense of sexual abuse in the first degree under W.Va. Code, 61-8B-7. The alleged victim was five years old and was in the care of Bobby Lee B.'s mother's at the time of the abuse.

On May 5, 2004, the case was scheduled for a preliminary hearing. Bobby Lee B. waived his preliminary hearing and entered an "Alford"-style plea. The court accepted the plea and adjudicated Bobby Lee B. a delinquent for "sexual abuse in the first degree."[1] Upon agreement of the parties, the court ordered that Bobby Lee B. undergo a sixty-day diagnostic evaluation at the Industrial Home for Youth. The court further ordered "that Dr. Thomas Adamski perform an appropriate sexual offender evaluation of the juvenile and that the Department of Health and Human [Resources] shall pay for services not covered by insurance, at Medicaid rates."

[1]By Order dated the 19th day of July, 2004, the circuit court found that the record should be corrected to reflect that the plea was to sexual abuse in the third degree.

On August 2, 2004, a status/disposition hearing was conducted and the court ordered that Bobby Lee B. be placed at Boys Village, Inc., in Wooster, Ohio.

On September 2, 2004, the court entered an order requiring the DHHR to pay Dr. Thomas R. Adamski, M.D. the sum of $1,000.00 for services performed in the case.[2]

On October 7, 2004, the DHHR filed a motion to vacate the payment order. The DHHR in its motion prayed that the court find that payment at the Medicaid rate would be proper. The DHHR claimed in its motion that it had paid Dr. Adamski the sum of $214.89, which represented payment at the Medicaid rate.

On November 8, 2004, the court conducted a hearing on the DHHR motion. After considering argument of counsel, the court denied the DHHR motion.[3] It is from this

[2]Dr. Adamski's statement for services was for: "4.0 Hours of Professional Time @ $250.00 per hour = $1000.00."

[3]In the order denying DHHR's motion, the court made the following findings:

> 1. That the juvenile, Bobby Lee [B.], is now fifteen (15) years of age, and that he was fourteen (14) years of age at the time that he committed the offense for which he was adjudicated delinquent herein, that being sexual assault of a five (5) year old child;
>
> 2. That sexual assault of any individual at any age is a very serious matter; however, the Court believes that sexual assault of a child is even more serious;
>
> 3. That because of his conduct and the offense that he committed, which would have been a crime if he were an adult, the juvenile had been in detention since approximately April of this year, or at least for a number of months;

November 8 order that DHHR appeals.

II.

3

> 4. That the juvenile is presently in a treatment facility in Ohio which costs roughly $3000.00 per month and he is expected to be there for at least a year which will result in a cost per annum roughly of $40,000;
>
> 5. That Dr. Adamski regularly does work for this Court, which is not only accepted by the Court and respected, but also accepted by most if not all members of the bar that practice before this Court;
>
> 6. That not only does Dr. Adamski do a thorough and excellent evaluation, he also does it promptly which is important to the Court and the parties;
>
> 7. That a psychological or psychiatric evaluation is of huge significance to the Court in deciding what to do with this youth, when in essence the Court is making a $40,000 decision to try and treat this youth so that he does not sexually assault another child;
>
> 8. That the State [Department] has suggested that the statute [§ 49-7-33] only permits the payment of $214.00 for the evaluation completed by Dr. Adamski, that being the applicable medicaid rate;
>
> 9. That the Court believes, however, that you generally get what you pay for, and that the Court would be very reluctant to make a $40,000 per annum decision which perhaps involves the sexual assault of young children on a $214.00 evaluation;
>
> 10. That the Court rather believes that it can make the best decision based upon a thorough evaluation report which the Court has received in this matter, and the Court does not believe that it can obtain a thorough and prompt evaluation at the amount represented by the Department; and,
> 11. That the Court believes it has inherent power to take such action as it deems appropriate to have this juvenile evaluated and perhaps prevent the sexual assault of young children.

In Syllabus Point 1 of Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995) we held "Where the issue on appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." In Syllabus Point 1 of In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996) we also recognized that questions of law are subject to a de novo standard of review. We find that the matter at bar is a question of interpretation and application of W.Va. Code, 49-7-33, and thus we apply a de novo standard of review.

W.Va. Code, 49-7-33 states as follows:

> §49-7-33. Payment of services.
> At any time during any proceedings brought pursuant to articles five and six of this chapter, the court may upon its own motion, or upon a motion of any party, order the West Virginia department of health and human resources to pay for professional services rendered by a psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional to a child or other party to the proceedings. Professional services include, but are not limited to, treatment, therapy, counseling, evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony. The West Virginia department of health and human resources shall set the fee schedule for such services in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate and adjust the schedule as appropriate. Every such psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional shall be paid by the West Virginia department of health and human resources upon completion of services and submission of a final report or other information and documentation as required by the policies and procedures implemented by the West Virginia department of health and human resources.

When interpreting statutes we have held:

> When a statute is clear and unambiguous and the legislative intent is plain, the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute. Syllabus Point 5 of State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, V.F.W., 144 W.Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959).

From our examination of W.Va. Code, 49-7-33, we find that the language therein relating to payment for professional services in both abuse and neglect cases and delinquency cases is governed by these Code provisions. We further find that the following provision is clear and unambiguous and that the legislative intent is clear:

> The West Virginia department of health and human resources shall set the fee schedule for such services in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate and adjust the schedule as appropriate.

W.Va. Code, 49-7-33 (2002), in part.

The payment of expert witnesses in abuse and neglect and delinquency cases has been discussed by this Court in two prior cases, namely Hewitt v. State Dept. of Health and Human Resources, 212 W.Va. 698, 575 S.E.2d 308 (2002) ("Hewitt I") and State ex rel. Artimez v. Recht, 216 W.Va. 709, 613 S.E.2d 76 (2005) (Per Curiam) ("Hewitt II").

In Hewitt I, 212 W.Va. at 703, 575 S.E.2d at 313, the Court did not apply the provision of W.Va. Code, 49-7-33, because the payment issues in that case predated the effective date of the statute.[4] In Hewitt I, the Court observed in footnote 10, however, as follows:

[4]The provisions of W.Va. Code, 49-7-33 went into effect on June 7, 2002.

> The provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 do not limit the fees charged by expert witnesses where such witnesses are retained privately. Those statutory provisions only operate as a restriction on the amount that can be charged when DHHR is ordered by the trial court to pay for health care services in connection with matters arising under articles five and six of chapter 49.[5]

In Hewitt II, 216 W.Va. at 711-712, 613 S.E.2d at 78-79, we further discussed Hewitt I and the application of W.Va. Code, 49-7-33 and stated as follows:

> This Court held that the DHHR was liable for the payment orders in abuse and neglect cases and that it was required to pay for the services at the rate established by the trial court, unless the order under consideration was entered after June 7, 2002, the effective date of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2004). [FN1] That statute provides that the DHHR "shall set the fee schedule for such services in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate and adjust the schedule as appropriate." West Virginia Code § 49-7-33. Consequently, the Hewitt I Court concluded the abuse and neglect fee issue by upholding the fees in underlying payment orders entered before June 7, 2002, and explaining that the payment orders entered after June 7, 2002, were subject to the statute's provisions regarding the Medicaid rate. [FN2] 212 W.Va. at 703, 575 S.E.2d at 313

In the instant case the payment order is for professional services performed in a juvenile delinquency proceeding as opposed to an abuse and neglect proceeding. As observed in Hewitt I and Hewitt II, the payment restrictions apply equally to abuse and neglect cases as they do in delinquency cases. Therefore, the payment order in this case requires the application of W.Va. Code, 49-7-33.

[5]Article five relates to "Juvenile Proceedings" and article six relates to "Procedure in Cases of Child Neglect and Abuse."

Consistent with the discussion in Hewitt I and Hewitt II and the clear and unambiguous language of W.Va. Code, 49-7-33, we conclude that the services provided by Dr. Thomas R. Adamski are payable at the Medicaid rate. We make no determination, however, as to whether or not the amount asserted by the DHHR as the proper amount to be paid to Dr. Adamski, to-wit: $214.89, is a correct application of the Medicaid rate in this case.[6]

III.

Based upon the forgoing, we reverse the Circuit Court of Randolph County.

Reversed.

[6]If there is a difficulty in obtaining specialized court services because of the application of Medicaid rates, W.Va. Code, 49-7-33 clearly provides the opportunity for the DHHR to address the problem by adopting rates other than the Medicaid rates.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

The provisions of W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., relating to child abuse and neglect, are not applicable to remove or discipline a teacher who is alleged to have abused students. Such removal or disciplinary procedures should be accomplished under the provisions of W.Va.Code, 18A-2-8 (1985), our teacher disciplinary statute.

MILLER, Justice.

In this case, we are asked to determine if the circuit court was correct in holding that a public school teacher was not subject to the provisions of W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., our child neglect and abuse statute, for alleged abuse of children in her classroom. We affirm the circuit court's holding.

Initially, we observe that there is no express language in this statute that places teachers within the purview of the statute. The petitioners argue that because the statute utilizes the term "custodian" in several places See footnote 1 and the term "custodian" is generally defined in W.Va.Code, 49-1-5(5), as a "person who has or shares actual physical custody of a child," See footnote 2 then a teacher should be deemed a custodian under the statute.

The only case that we have found dealing with the question is Pennsylvania State Education Ass'n v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, Department of Public Welfare, 68 Pa.Cmwlth. 279, 449 A.2d 89 (1982), in which an educational association and a public school teacher sought a declaratory judgment to determine if teachers were subject to the provisions of the Child Protective Services Law (CPSL). The court concluded they were not.

The Pennsylvania CPSL utilized the phrase "by a person responsible for the child's welfare" and the claim was made, as here, that this implicated a teacher. However, the court, 449 A.2d at 92, rejected this as giving any indication that the legislature intended to draw teachers within the ambit of the statute:

> "We believe we may safely assume that the legislature was well aware of the legislation already 'on the books' which would protect children from abuse by school employees and, by enacting the CPSL did not intend to duplicate those provisions, but rather, intended to fill a gap in an area where no prior legislative protection had been provided."

Moreover, we have substantial doubt that a teacher is a "custodian" under our child neglect and abuse statute, W.Va.Code, 49-6-1(b). This term is defined in W.Va.Code, 49-1-5(5). See footnote 3 In Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W.Va. 184, 186, 324 S.E.2d 145, 147 (1984), we spoke to the custodian question under the statute and stated: "A custodian, freely chosen by the children's parents, may not be deprived of her custody rights by the Department of Human Services arbitrarily."

A teacher's custody of children does not derive from any voluntary act on the part of the parents, but arises from our compulsory school attendance law, W.Va.Code, 18-8-1, which, in relevant part, provides: "Compulsory school attendance shall begin with the seventh birthday and continue to the sixteenth birthday."

The petitioners also rely on W.Va.Code, 18A-5-1, which provides that a "teacher shall stand in the place of the parent or guardian in exercising authority over the school, and shall have control of all pupils enrolled in the school from the time they reach the school until they have returned to their respective homes." They contend that this language demonstrates that the legislature intended to bring teachers within the child abuse and neglect statute.

We do not agree for several reasons. This statute was enacted in 1919, See footnote 4 long before the first enactment of the child neglect and abuse statute in 1941. See footnote 5 As we pointed out in Smith v. West Virginia State Board of Education, 170 W.Va. 593, 597, 295 S.E.2d 680, 685 (1982), this Code provision embodies the in loco parentis doctrine which "originated in the English common law and recognizes that a parent delegates part of his parental authority while the child is in their custody." We also noted in Smith that one of the reasons for the doctrine was to enable the school authorities to discipline school children. Thus, the statute which incorporated the in loco parentis doctrine is unrelated to and perhaps inconsistent with the concepts underlying our child neglect and abuse statute. See footnote 6 Furthermore, as the court in Pennsylvania State Education Ass'n, 449 A.2d at 92, points out in regard to its similar statute:

> "It is our opinion that the statutory provision invests authority in public school teachers; it does not impose a duty upon them. It has been held that Section 1317 of the Code was 'never intended' to invest in teachers all the authority of parents over their children but rather only such authority as is necessary to maintain discipline in the schools. Axtell v. LaPenna, 323 F.Supp. 1077 (W.D.Pa.1971)." (Emphasis in original).

The Pennsylvania court also reviewed the provisions of the CPSL and concluded that its emphasis was on the parents and the family environment of the child and, therefore, could not be deemed to include the temporary daily custody of teachers. Our child neglect and abuse statute has much the same focus, particularly as it is supplemented by W.Va.Code, 49-6D-1, et seq. Furthermore, as our cases indicate, our child neglect and abuse procedures involve the removal of the child from its family environment when remedial measures are unavailing. E.g., State ex rel. W.Va.Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987); In Re Darla B., 175 W.Va.137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985); State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983); State v. Scritchfield, 175 W.Va. 58, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981).

There is nothing within our child neglect and abuse statute that authorizes the removal of the parent from the child. Furthermore, it is impossible to correlate the procedural mechanism in the statute to a teacher-child relationship. Our child neglect and abuse statute has as a primary policy to keep the child with the family under counseling and to remove the child only when it is necessary. See footnote 7 To impose the statutory removal procedures for children in a school setting as the petitioners urge by removing the teacher would require this Court to rewrite the statute. Procedural due process would have to be afforded the involved teacher when any removal is sought. See North v. Board of Regents, 160 W.Va. 248, 233 S.E.2d 411 (1977). The present statutory proceedings for child neglect and abuse would have to be redesigned to afford such protection. This task is obviously more suited to the legislature.

We were confronted with a somewhat related fact pattern in Mullins v. Kiser, 175 W.Va. 56, 331 S.E.2d 494 (1985), where a school teacher was alleged to have participated in the abuse of a student. In that suit, the teacher's removal was sought under W.Va.Code, 6-6-7 (1979), which relates to the removal of public officials. We held that this procedure was unavailing because the teacher was not a public official and that W.Va.Code, 18A-2-8, dealing with the removal of teachers, was applicable.

Among the arguments advanced in Mullins was one that underlies the petitioners' concerns in this case, i.e., that if a board of education does not act to discipline or remove a teacher, a citizen is without remedy. In Mullins, 175 W.Va. at ---, 331 S.E.2d at 496, we explained that this was not the case:

> "[A] public school employee may be dismissed on a complaint initiated by a citizen outside the school system. Mason Cty. Bd. of Educ. v. State Supt. of Schools, [165] W.Va. [732], 274 S.E.2d 435, 439 (1981). A school board has a duty to consider and act on such citizens' complaints, and may be compelled to do so by appropriate legal action if its inaction is arbitrary. See, e.g., State ex rel. Withers v. Board of Educ., 153 W.Va. 867, 879-81, 172 S.E.2d 796, 802-04 (1970)."

Moreover, as Pennsylvania State Education Ass'n points out, in addition to removal under teacher disciplinary statutes, it is possible for a teacher to be sued civilly or charged criminally for child abuse. We acknowledged the availability of these remedies in Smith v. West Virginia State Bd. of Education, supra.

Finally, we decline to create a removal right against teachers under the child neglect and abuse statute when there is a specific removal provision available under W.Va.Code, 18A-2-8, which covers this situation. See footnote 8 To do so would run counter to our traditional rule of statutory construction that a specific statute will take precedence over a general statute dealing with the same subject matter. E.g., Manchin v. Dunfee, 174 W.Va. 532, 327 S.E.2d 710 (1984); State ex rel. Simpkins v. Harvey, 172 W.Va. 312, 305 S.E.2d 268 (1983); State ex rel. Sahley v. Thompson, 151 W.Va. 336, 151 S.E.2d 870 (1966).

For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the provisions of W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., relating to child abuse and neglect, are not applicable to remove or discipline a teacher who is alleged to have abused students. Such removal or disciplinary procedures should be accomplished under the provisions of W.Va.Code, 18A-2-8 (1985), our teacher disciplinary statute. Therefore, the ruling of the circuit court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 W.Va.Code, 49-6-1(b), requires the child neglect petition to be "served upon both parents and any other custodian." The word "custodian" is also used in W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, which sets out the right to counsel and the hearing procedures.

Footnote: 2 The full text of W.Va.Code, 49-1-5(5), is: " 'Custodian' means a person who has or shares actual physical possession or care and custody of a child, regardless of whether such person has been granted custody of the child by any contract, agreement or legal proceedings."

Footnote: 3 See note 2, supra, for the text of W.Va.Code, 49-1-5(5).

Footnote: 41919 W.Va.Acts ch. 2, § 87.

Footnote: 5 1941 W.Va.Acts ch. 73.

Footnote: 6 In Smith, we curtailed the right of teachers to administer corporal punishment by prohibiting the use of a "paddle, whip, stick or other mechanical devices." 170 W.Va. at 599, 295 S.E.2d at 687. In 1983, the legislature amended W.Va.Code, 18A-5-1, to permit the use of a paddle. This reinforces our conclusion that the legislature did not envision that this section would be construed to include school personnel under our child neglect and abuse statute.

Footnote: 7 The petitioners do not argue and we do not address whether the child may be removed from the classroom upon allegations of child abuse by a teacher.

Footnote: 8 W.Va.Code, 18A-2-8 (1985), provides:
"Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, a board may suspend or dismiss any person in its employment at any time for: Immorality, incompetency, cruelty, insubordination, intemperance or willful neglect of duty, but the charges shall be stated in writing served upon the employee within two days of presentation of said charges to the board. The employee so affected shall be given an opportunity, within five days of receiving such written notice, to request, in writing, a level four hearing and appeals pursuant to provisions of article twenty-nine [§ 18-29-1 et seq.], chapter eighteen of the code of West Virginia, one thousand nine hundred thirty-one, as amended." While this statute was amended in 1985, its basic grounds for removal have been longstanding.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

Sylvia Mae BOWENS

v.

Honorable Elliot E. MAYNARD.

v.

John E. BURDETTE, II.

Nos. 16519, 16520.

Dec. 18, 1984.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. If a party has lawful physical custody of a child, she has the right to service of process and to be heard in any proceeding that concerns the child.

2. If a party having lawful physical custody of a child is not served with process of a proceeding concerning that child she has the right to intervene in that proceeding.

Paul R. Sheridan, Logan, for appellant.

Susan Shelton Perry, Perry & Perry, Logan, for children.

Mary Beth Kershner, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for appellee.

NEELY, Justice:

The petitioner in these two consolidated cases requests a writ of habeas corpus to show why she should not regain the custody of five children who were entrusted into her care. She also asks that a writ of prohibition be issued to restrain the circuit court from further proceedings regarding the children until a final order in habeas corpus is issued or, in the alternative, to prohibit the circuit court from continuing without first granting intervention to the petitioner. Because the petitioner had lawful physical custody of the children we hold that she had the right, as custodian, to be served with process and to be heard in any proceeding that involved the children. This Court denies the writ of habeas corpus but awards the writ of prohibition as moulded to prohibit the circuit court from entering any order concerning the children until the petitioner is allowed to intervene.

I

The petitioner, Miss Sylvia Mae Bowens, is a twenty-nine-year-old nurse's aid and private caretaker who currently lives with her parents in Logan County. For eight months before June 1984, Miss Bowens lived in the Adkins' home in Mingo County and cared for Mr. and Mrs. Adkins' five children. During this time it appears that Miss Bowens and the children developed strong emotional bonds. The Adkins children, whose ages range from four to nine years, were placed in the custody of the petitioner by written agreement of Mrs. Adkins on 25 April 1984 and with the apparent acquiescence of Mr. Adkins. On 9 June 1984, Miss Bowens took the Adkins children to her parents' home and stated her intention to adopt the children after the statutory six month period under W.Va.Code 48-4-9(a) [1984] had elapsed.

On 3 August 1984 Mr. and Mrs. Adkins were divorced. Although the Adkins children were not residing with either parent the court awarded the father permanent custody. Thereafter, Mr. Adkins went to Miss Bowen's residence but was repulsed in his attempts to regain the custody of his children. Because Miss Bowens feared that the father would return and that the children would be abused by Mr. Adkins, she contacted the Department of Human Services.

Miss Bowens' apprehension regarding Mr. Adkins was well-founded. The record discloses that the Department of Human Services had first investigated allegations that the Adkins children were abused in 1980. A child psychiatrist stated that "these are the most emotionally disturbed children she has ever encountered" and added that "all five children have been severely abused physically and sexually by their parents." See footnote 1

After Mr. Adkins attempted, unsuccessfully, to regain the children's custody, the Department of Human Services filed a petition alleging abuse. Pursuant to this petition, a hearing was held for the Adkins children on 10 August 1984. Mr. and Mrs. Adkins, their appointed counsel, members of the Department of Human Services, an assistant prosecuting attorney for the Department of Human Services, and an appointed counsel for the children were all present. Miss Bowens attended the hearing too, but was not served with notice and was not permitted in chambers during the hearing--all contrary to the procedural statutory rights of a lawful custodian.

After the hearing, the circuit court placed the children in the custody of the Department of Human Services. The order acknowledges that Mr. and Mrs. Adkins did not, at that time, have custody of their children yet, inexplicably, did not consider allowing the children to remain with Miss Bowens although, by all indications, the children were adequately cared for there. As a result of this order the children were scattered among five foster homes. According to medical reports in the record, the children have not adjusted well to their dispersal and are extremely depressed. Two of the Adkins children were placed in hospital because they exhibited suicidal tendencies. Initially Miss Bowens visited the children, but was later told she could not continue to do so.

On 27 September 1984, Miss Bowen attempted to intervene in the ongoing abuse proceedings against Mr. and Mrs. Adkins. Although the parent's counsel had no objection to Miss Bowen's intervention, her inclusion in the proceedings was denied.
